Summer Care Of Hens Profitable

Accumulation of flock records received at the College of Agriculture, University of Kentucky, often show a slump in both egg production and profits in the summer.

Causes for this slump are listed as lack of balanced feeding, too many non-producing hens, lice and mites, lack of sufficient cool fresh water, and the heat.

Nothing can be done about the weather, but the hens can be provided with proper feed, an abundance of fresh drinking water, shade, and kept free from lice and mites.

Early molters should be culled out and sold. Few early molters will come back into production soon enough to be profitable. Likewise, sell all male birds not wanted for breeding next season, and all broody hens.

It usually is necessary to cull the pullets as well as the old birds. Keep only those birds that have made rapid growth, that are well feathered and are healthy and vigorous.

Clean the poultry houses often and well. Clean and scald or disinfect all drinking vessels. Arrange to exercise precaution against chickens carrying and roup which attack many flocks in the fall.

Poultry specialists or sexing experts can readily pick out the pullets and cockerels in a group of newly hatched chicks.

KENTUCKY

(Hugh Malcolm McCormick)

From where the wastrel waters meet
In broad brown eager flood,
To where the Cumberlands uplift
Their laurled heads to God;
Ineffable in warm wide light
Broad reach and upland far,
To bounds as small as dewdrop and rapt
As sifted day dreams are.

From eastern ramparts blue and cool
That wake the morning sun,
To mellow starlit western fields
Dew drenched when day is done;
Sweet, wonderful, inviolate, a long
Between the hills and streams,
A bounty of generous loveliness
For splendid deeds and dreams.
