Endrin Receives Label Acceptance For Control Of Major Tobacco Insects

Tobacco hornworms, tobacco budworms, flea hoppers and grasshoppers can now be stopped with incredibly small dosages of a new insecticide, it was announced this week by F. W. Hatch, Manager of the Agricultural Chemicals Division of Shell Chemical Corporation.

The insecticide, endrin, has just been granted label acceptance by the U. S. Department of Agriculture for use against these pests. In a liquid formulation, or as a one per cent dust, Hatch indicated, 2 to 4 pound-per-acre dosages were adequate for the protection of the growing tobacco plants.

Label registration on endrin was completed after three years of intensive research were spent in compiling performance data, and two years of work put in on flavor and residue evaluations.

Hatch pointed out that these studies have shown that endrin at recommended dosages will not leave harmful residues or affect the smoking quality of tobacco.

"When you consider that a single tobacco or tomato hornworm can devour a pound of tobacco in its lifetime, and a few of these worms can riddle a tobacco plant, endrin's effectiveness as a tobacco insecticide becomes significant," Hatch stated.

Endrin was introduced last year as a cotton insecticide. Agricultural research now under way indicates that in addition to cotton and tobacco, endrin will soon have an important part to play in the control of many insects on a variety of crops throughout the nation.

Horsepower Replaces Manpower on Farms to Move Many Heavy Loads

Shown above are four of the many methods used to move produce on the farm. Although they do not cover the field by any means, they illustrate some of the ways in which horsepower is replacing manpower in handling many of those "back-breaking" farm jobs.

By IRA MILLER
Farm Electrification Bureau.

In the panel at the upper left, an elevator is used to move corn into a temporary crib. This application may be more popular than ever this year because of a shortage of permanent storage places on some farms and the prospects of another bumper crop. The carry-over of corn this year may reach 900,000,000 bushels. The lower left panel illustrates the combined use of a wagon unloader and an inclined plane elevator to move newly harvested onions into a storage building for forced air drying.

At the lower left we see a horizontal conveyor at work in a barn now. The bales are dumped on the conveyor at the now door after being hoisted up by means of an inclined plane elevator operation adjacent to the farmer's wagon. In the now, the conveyor is shifted around so that the bales are stacked where desired. Boards are angled along the bed of the conveyor to "free-up" off the bales on either side. These guide boards are inserted and removed manually to control the direction of "fall" for each approaching bale. The picture at the lower right shows another way of handling baled hay—this time for stacking on the ground floor of a pole barn. A small electric motor does the work of "lifting" bales to various heights.

Many farmers have gone far beyond the equipment shown here. Some move mixed feed by conveyors or blowers directly to the feed lot; others "augur" grain out of storage bins for removal to feed carts, grinders and mixers. Automatic feeders carry mash to chickens or silage to cattle; other types of conveyors remove manure from barn gutters. There seems no end to the ways in which farmers use electric power to move, lift or remove food, feed, and waste materials much more easily, quickly, conveniently and at less cost than their grandfads would have thought possible.
