early stages, Ridomil, as a systemic protection of the plant, is a good preventative measure, he said.

However, if the mold appears to be gaining a foothold on the plant despite the Ridomil, Phillips advises farmers to avoid the inclination to use a second application of Ridomil.

"The danger we have encountered by using too much Ridomil to kill blue mold or any other type fungus is that, eventually, the fungus will mutate to a form that Ridomil cannot harm," Phillips said.

To prevent the creation of a Ridomil resistant disease, Phillips said the state agriculture department has approved the use of the fungicide Dithane M45 to kill the fungus on contact. It has been approved this year because of the current potential of a serious outbreak demands a 2-fold control measure, he said.

"You cannot get away with killing just 90 percent of the fungus. We need to get all of it, or next year, it is very likely a Ridomil resistant variety of the mold could develop. This type of mold would be very hard to get rid of and could cause greater crop damage next year," Phillips said.

A strain of Ridomil resistant mold did develop in areas around Mexico, Phillips said, where Ridomil was used as the only chemical agent, Phillips said. To prevent such an occurrence in this area, it is much more advantageous for farmers to use the 2-fold method of blue mold management, he said.

What must be avoided, Phillips said, is the use of Clorox or any type of bleach to attempt to control the disease.

In a battery of tests, bleach has been in no way proven to be effective in the control of blue mold, Phillips said. Bleach does have the potential of damaging the crop and earning a heavy fine against farmers who use it, he said.

If chlorine levels in the plant are detected above 3 percent , the crop is thrown out of market and a heavy fine imposed on the farmer, Phillips said.

"It is in the county, but it has not reached epidemic proportions. But if it is not checked, it could get that way," Phillips said.

Farmers must report excess carryover crops

The U.S. Department of Agriculture announced that producers of 1992 and subsequent crops of burley and flue-cured tobacco must report carryover tobacco in excess of 500 pounds that they intend to destroy.

"This report will be made to USDA's county Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service offices," said Keith Bjerke, ASCS administrator. "Moreover, the report of unmarketed tobacco must be made prior to its disposition or destruction."

Bjerke said that for the past few marketing years there has been considerable concern that tobacco remaining on farms at the end of the season that had been produced in excess of 103 percent of the effective farm marketing quota has been moving into trade channels illegally.

"ASCS recently assessed marketing quota penalties in excess of $30 million against tobacco dealers and warehouse operators for handling excess tobacco," said Bjerke. "The primary source of this tobacco appears to be from producer carryover tobacco."

Bjerke said producers are already required to report, at the close of each marketing season, the pounds of unmarketed tobacco on hand, its location and the pounds of unmarketed tobacco that is destroyed. "The among of tobacco reported at destroyed has increased significantly in recent years," he said.

Bjerke said the new reporting requirements exclude tobacco lost in the field as green tobacco; tobacco not harvested; scrap tobacco and tobacco leaves of poor quality that accumulate during preparation of tobacco for marketing.

"When the producer files a report an ASCS official will visit the farm and witness the disposition or destruction of the tobacco," Bjerke said. "In addition, ASCS is adopting internal controls to detect producers who fail to report carryover tobacco remaining on the farm and will also conduct more on-site farm checks. These new rules may cause added burdens on some tobacco farmers but the problem is serious enough to warrant their adoption."

Bjerke said producers that fail to account for production and disposition of tobacco on the farm or file false reports or false identification of tobacco are committing serious offenses. "Producers who violate tobacco program regulations are subject to criminal and civil action, in addition to farm allotment and quota reductions," he said.

Producers should contact their county ASCS office for further information.
