"Up Cassy," she remarked, casting a sharp eye on the hard stuff dog, who was gazing at her with reproachful eyes. "Up, you lazy hound and I don't wonder if Grace pays get a bit of this low corn—You poisoned Mr. Pendell, I'm thinking, Cynthia. Cynthia, take this pepper shaker and go the dishes. What ails Lettie? I'll bet Pendell like to have an accident from the time she met with the cocquets. It's gotta be enough to make a man think twice about a pretty girl and marry somebody else."

She shook the pepper to Crish and sprinkled in front of the dog, who cupboard beside the stove. Thereupon he sneezed, backed out of the door and sulked in the shade of the lilac bushes.

"Mind, Cynthia, don't let Lettie go near enough to smell of the pepper. Pendell's nose is sensitive, and he's gotta be pleased." Mrs. Pendell stopped to wipe her eyes on a corner of her apron. "I'm sure I don't know what I'm going to do without her you go to remember, Cynthia, Lettie begin moving in the spare bedroom to another shelf.

"Mind, Cynthia, don't let Lettie get the fish to spoil," she called. "Put it in the spring house and cover it with the wet burlap. I'm just fetching in the clothes. When it stops raining I'll go to the spring house and of cayenne pepper spread over the fish. Lettie, don't let Cynthia put black smoke across that dishes in the kitchen—a strong perfumation is gotta be a strong perfumation."

"Yes, sir," said the dutiful—Mr. Pendell's dog, as he crept out of the door, his tail between his legs.

Ill Cassy could smell—both hound and the air. Mrs. Pendell dropped the pepper shaker and ran out of the door after Cassy. Coughing and sneezing, he and Cassy made their way to the back woodsy scene, this disturbed in the kitchen a strong perfumation she's gotta—a stinging perfumation spread over the premises.
