CONTROL OF SHEEP PEST EXPLAINED IN CIRCULAR

How farmers and sheep raisers can rid their flocks of stomach worms, which are said to have caused great loss in the sheep industry, is explained in a circular just published, the subject of a new circular which has just come off the press at the College of Agriculture. While time has come to learn about the treatment and control of these worms, there is enough known to make it worthwhile to be more careful of the parasite, provided proper precautions be taken, the publication points out.

The parasite is well outlined in the circular as follows: "Its shape resembles a barber's pole. Its length is about one-half inch. It is fastened on her gizzard in the spring. The copper sulphate treatment, one of the oldest methods for controlling stomach worms, and the one most generally used, is explained, and the publication gives the following directions given for administering the drug: Dissolve in No. 1½ sulphate, "Bluestone" Water in Dissolve.
