MONUMENTS

When selecting a monument you want the best goods at attractive prices. Call and see what we have to offer. Also we are prepared to do all that I could to keep her to return to her people." Will talk to her in the morning. Harold promised.

Harold refire to the dressing room and made Mary to stay in one hour. Now young fellows can smoke to their heart's content. Give me your Herald."

Harold think we shall stop long, if course we, sir." Gerald confided. rose in his feet. "It's Christmas first night in Monte Carlo and to show him the resort. Come on, old chap, and make your bow to the Princess Mary."

Mary made room for Christmas by her side. She was wearing a good of her mother's good looks, her complexion was good, her features unexceptionable, but eyes deep as a mine apparently, her time was almost attractive. Her figure, especially in a riding habit, was under her skill at golf and tennis fell in the ordinary manner. It was lack of office that, as Gerald, in course of age, she was still unmarried.

Mary talked for some time with Lady Harry's old friend, Christmas. Gerald stood by, smoking a cigarette and looking at the Princess Mary. Christmas leaned forward to call across the room through his mind to Gerald.

"Your friend seems to get on very well with Mary," he observed. "Mary's always been pain." Gerald replied.

Mary pretty well at the bar, isn't she?"

Wondering well. They say he's to be one of our younger Ministers.

Hysterics said nothing for all moments.

Mary has her aunt's hundred thousands," he said at length. "Nice difficult position for a girl, isn't it, to be her own mind, though. Mr. never interfere, surely?"

Girls is a good fellow, but I don't to be his any thought of marrying her," Gerald remarked. "You mind if I take him off now, sir? shall meet for lunch at the Golf tomorrow."

Christopher obeyed his friend's assent without enthusiasm. Gerald ever, was both insistent and impatient, and the two young men took a few minutes later.

Gerald dragged his friend into the of the casino, where they obtained tickets for the Grand Prix and afterwards on to the Sporting Club, the Haven of Gerald's rendezvous. Gerald, at any rate, Christopher brightened a little more to have them in the casino." Gerald, where was you remembered the day by which he was surrounded more attractive. After Gerald had a seat at the baccarat table, Christopher found himself surrounded by this strange, cosmopolitan crowd, chiefly composed of the new-moneyed Americans, seeking adventure. Suddenly, the noise of the crowd, the smell of the tobacco, the swift billiards, with the flashing of jewels and the glare in the gaming rooms, the tall, handsome, and the girl looking over his shoulder, the tired but hard face of her face—her beautiful eyes, her passionate, resentful upper lip, quivering lips, her child's figure; under spread of her, the soul and fitness of her innocent youth clinging, some fresh, sweet perfume of trembling body.

Gerald stood suddenly before him, his face intense, his eyes brilliant. His voice quivered slightly with subdued excitement.

"Christopher, you monstrous old fellow, come with me. I want to show you the most wonderful woman in the world. I don't know her place or name, but I know she's—she."

"What, another adventure? Christmas, you're incorrigible. You're talking about Mirrelle?"

"That child? No!" was the immediate rejoinder. "I tell you it's some woman, who seems to be a sort of Queen of Sheba, or Cleopatra, or about here but no one seems to know who she is." "Wait till you see her! I'm not easily led away. I've gone through a good many women in most of the capitals of the world. I was at Vienna and Rome before the war, you know, but I never—Don't move, Christmas. I don't look a fool, and
