HELPFUL HINTS

"Don't throw away your chicken feet," advises a government bulletin. Chicken feet, properly cleaned and boiled, have considerable food value and they make a good addition to soup.

Kindness pays, even when you are cooking. Boil those potatoes gently and they will be ever so much better.

Cabbage heads are liable to split, and become damaged owing to the excess moisture and growth, when the conditions are very favorable. The splitting can be prevented to some extent by taking hold of the head with both hands and giving it a slight jerk, sufficient to loosen the leaves a little.

It's a good time now to move the weeds in your garden, if you haven't done it already.

Allow mud stains to dry, and then brush off.

Cut flowers may be kept fresh longer by adding a little salt to the water.

To remove egg stains from fabrics, wash first with cold water and then with warm water and soap.

Water spots on a silk dress may be removed by rubbing the spots with the same fabric from which the dress is made.

BUSINESS TRAINING IN KENTUCKY HIGH SCHOOLS

(A. J. Lawrence, Assistant Professor of Economics, University of Kentucky, furnished through the courtesy of the Kentucky Academy of Social Sciences.)

Kentucky is now forging ahead in business education after lagging behind other states of the South and West. It now rates far ahead of many of the other southern states in both high school and collegiate business education and is likely to become a leader among these states. Practically every section of the state has business training in some of its high schools. Central Northern and Western Kentucky are giving more attention to this type of training. A logical explanation for this fact is that more and larger industries are located on or near the Ohio River which creates a demand for vocational business training. Another explanation is that special types of training in high schools cannot be offered in small schools because of the inability to finance a broad program of training. The small school sections of the state are not progressing as much as the other sections. The explanation is the reverse of the one for the rapid development in the larger centers of population in the state. In the small schools, which predominate in Southern and Eastern Kentucky, there are not enough duties to absorb stenographers and bookkeepers. The need for development and trained teachers has delayed the introduction of business training in the high schools.

It is interesting to follow the development of business training in the state. Such training early became a matter of concern. Penmanship, itinerant penman, arithmetical magicians, and business colleges were more or less experienced. Even today the terms business training and business education are used interchangeably. Many people handwriting of an ornamental nature, rapid calculation, typewriting, shorthand and bookkeeping. The first high schools in Kentucky to offer commercial subjects were in Louisville, Covington, and Owensboro where the work was introduced about 1900. Later cities like Paducah, Newport, Hopkinsville and Ashland offered courses in business to a strong demand for vocational training. Today it is not unexpected in high schools of smaller size cities about the size of the World War and later. Now many small schools can be found in rural sections like Heath and Lone Oak in Western Kentucky and other rural sections in Kentucky. Small schools are offering fairly complete training in commerce. Not only have some of the cities of medium size do not offer such course adequately for the need in each, either financial or educational. The business training is a much broader than mere skill in a few vocational subjects. Vocational training is important but to train stenographers and bookkeepers is not a problem which can be solved by mere training even for vocational use. Surveys have shown that 75 to 80 per cent of the graduates of the high school have either of these occupations. A much larger percentage engage in merchandising of some kind. Department stores, chain stores, drug stores, gasoline stations and other business firms make up the field where they manage their own establishments or work for others. Even those who secure employment in factories, offices and other clerical work of some kind. High schools in the larger communities should be taken of their vocational needs.

The depression with its economic upsets has aroused a new interest in practical economic training. This serious business of making a living is not a matter of conducting one's affairs in a systematic manner has become more apparent. The depression with its emphasis on economic planning and reform will add a new impetus for a broad type of training in practical economics. Our economic problems are chiefly problems of distribution and not of production, now, it is distribution and not the other end of the economic cycle, consumption. It is quite as important to know how to spend one's income as it is to earn that income. All of us are consumers and many of us are producers, but, among the multiplicity of commodities, services and ideas, the problem of salesmanship, most of us need instruction in the art of buying. In fact, if it is to function in daily living, must provide training in the use in the high school let us put greater emphasis on the social aspects of business training. Since the public high school is "the poor man's college," the end of its formal education, and since every person has many business relationships, it should provide the best training possible for well-rounded living. The public high school is in a fair position to provide adequate training for those who end their school days at the end of the high school course as it is to provide preparatory training for those who expect to continue in college. On the other hand, courses in business are not and should not be designed for the non-college student who has planned and taught properly, business courses should provide adequate preparation for college as many others.

School boards and school administrators are responsible for this situation and the communities for educational opportunities. Why require for courses in business are provided in sufficiently large numbers, every community can have them.

Circuit Court Costs Reduced 18 Per Cent

The cost of jury service in circuit courts of the state has been reduced $125,000 approximately 18 per cent, in the last two years according to a recent report on jury costs compiled by the Legislative Research Examiner. Nat B. Bewell He estimates that total court costs were reduced last year $125,000 and will be recognized as a significant economy item in the effort to reduce the expense of state government.

The cost of jury service in circuit state administration in 1932 public school, 1933 salaries of Inspector and Examiner Bewell to the heavy circuit courts State Auditor Thomas Rhea showed the most decided increase in cost of jurors and witness claims.
