PHIL. SHERIDAN'S DIVISION

His Brave Brigade Commanders Were All Killed.

The Story of Seven Days' Fighting—Interesting Military Smorgasbords Both Before They Fought Like Bears—Rosecrans and "Old Rough"—Yarbrough's Last Love—Gen. Cruft's Confederate Friends—Pillow's Battle Wheel.

[Prepared by the American from Associated Chattanooga nights, 1863, Col. G. V. Sheridan, the Forty-second Illinois regiment, was the enemy between the Army of the Cumberland and Chattanooga. Gen. Phil. Sheridan, who commanded the Third brigade in Gen. Sheridan's division, He had been doing picket duty on the extreme right of the army, and was now ordered to the front. He was in command of a division under both Generals Thomas and Rosecrans, and was one of the most trusted officers of the army.

Until Sept. 19 Sheridan's division was not engaged in any battle. It was then ordered to the left of the army, where a battle was raging. Before it reached the field, however, the battle was lost and won, and Sheridan's division, that never before had been engaged, was ordered to cover the retreat of the army. It was then that Sheridan's division won its fame. It was the only division of the Fourteenth Army corps that was not broken in the retreat. Gen. Sheridan, Gen. Davis, Gen. Baird and Gen. Negley, the division commanders, were all brave men, but Sheridan was the best fighter of the four. He was born in Kentucky in 1831, but when a youth moved to Ohio, and at the breaking out of the war was a captain in the Thirteenth United States infantry. He was soon promoted to be colonel of the Second Michigan, and was made brigadier-general in September, 1862. He was a quick, nervous man, with a quick temper, and was a fighter from the word go. He was not a handsome man, but he was a good soldier, and his men loved him. He was a small man, and his face was smooth shaven. He had a quick, nervous way of talking, and was a rapid writer. He was a man of few words, and was not much of a talker. He was a man of few words, and was not much of a talker. He was a man of few words, and was not much of a talker.
