Safety Cruiser Attracts Much Interest Here

The "Safety Cruiser"—a new and effective instrument in the cause of highway safety—made its appearance here Tuesday, attracting wide-spread attention.

Resembling a water-craft with its pilot house and its pontoons, the bus "vessel" broadcast through its public address system its warning and its lesson of safety on the public.

A public official in a talk from the Cruiser, remarked, "Before we can be safe we must be safety conscious, and I sincerely trust that the visit of this beautiful and unusual cruiser will make all of us more deeply conscious of our responsibility to walk and drive more carefully, taking just a little more time to be safe."

The public was given an opportunity to inspect the interior of the magnificent "land yacht" which has a spacious lounge, electrical kitchen (no galley), and side sleeping accommodations for the crew, running water, a improved projection room, two-way radio equipment, and many other features.

The Safety Cruiser is making a state-wide tour with the full cooperation of the Governor, and the State Departments of Highways and Safety. This undertaking is one of the Standard Oil Company's contributions in the national campaign to reduce the appalling accident toll on our crowded highways. The entire public activity of the Cruiser is free to all.

During the educational journey of the Safety Cruiser in this section of the state, it is being directed by Mr. S. B. Carring'on, representative of the Standard Oil Company.

In a Name

By DAPHNE A. McVICKER

"WHAT can you do?" the brawny black-haired giant asked what was the matter, what can anybody do? Take this yellow bandit, this Jasper Reddon that wants to take her silver night and set away. Suppose you tell her how big I am? Suppose I would you do? Chuffie him weekly? Suppose I wanted to, why shall you'd do."

The small girl in the white coat shifted, her dark eyes blazing.

"Is that what you'd do, Court?" she asked the large man that was coming Frazer, back on a corner of the country club porch.

"Not at all," his good humored voice was careless. "I should see pulse on this bandit. That's my middle name. Guile. Courtney G. Frazier, Guile, Inc. I should consider Mr. Bandit, being short of physical prowess, and—" "Oh!" the girl scooped a white kid pump. "You all make me sick. Teel makes me sick. It's a great big beam like Ted saying bold let a bandit pump off with her. It's just the one sicker sulking a joke out of everything, Court. I'd be ashamed to own up to your name, if you don't mind making fun of it."

"Suppose Virginia was at the wheel of a powerful red roadster, spinning along a lonely road, and that with all of the motor's strength purring under her fingers. When she slowed down to turn into the main road she heard and saw a big black car that came from the rumble seat.

"And then it turn to a round that way," it said. "It opens my powers among strangers. Suppose they did I frighten you, Jinny? Didn't you know I was back here disguised in this blanket?

"The disguise was impenetrable," she told him between clicked white teeth. "Just something that has to be carried. Full of mystery."

He had climbed over into the seat beside her and he bent a look of white royal remonstrance upon her.

"And don't let me hear that was made for sweeter things."

"Oh, I'm just friendly as the fellow of a man homed up in the darkness. It was a white, worried face, that and killed by the cruel claws of animal and the voice that came from it as an answer to my question.

"It K. there, stop the car," he said, yellow eyes glowing. "Get out. Hop. Tin taking your place. And you'll be safe enough."

A small sound came from Virginia's throat. "Drive, Ted," he said, more steadily.

"He wouldn't do that," he said. "There's a car coming—"

The man pressed into the seat beside Virginia. "Drive!" he told Courtney. The moonlight showed Courtney's face shocked and pale under its pallor, eyes shining blue and confident. "Leave," he said to Virginia. "The girl can't drive. I was just teaching her, and I'm tired. But if he will show me how to stop, I'll take my place."

"Nobody but the car is miles, father, father, father, Virginia moaned to herself. Nobody but the car. Nobody the car stopped. There was a barrier across the road, a row of flares and a man with a red flag in a great blinding in Virginia's face.

"He was a bad man, she thought he said, sighing thankfully. "Now, I'll be safe." Ted was saying to him. If the state would see to him not my car. But I so good, Ted, and I'm so tired. I'm more afraid of him than I'm afraid of my life. But why did he try to run?

"Ted laughed. "He thought he heard his name," he said. "It's Jaspar Reddon I've been looking for, you know. All cars stopped to see if they'd say 'Jaspar Reddon' and I would only guess that he was the man I thought it was worth taking a chance."

When they had answered questions and turned the great car back toward the direction from which it had come, Courtney laughed. "And suppose we'd guessed wrong?"

"There's a lot in yours," Virginia said, looking at him with the light in her eyes. "Suppose you had been in custody of Jailer F. L. Johnson. Judge Wood and County Attorney T. Robert McGinty, prosecutor at the trial, asked for the dismissal.

Great Secrecy Marked Departure Of Troops For France Twenty Years Ago

Two decades have passed since June, 1917, when the vanguard of American troops left France to participate in the World War, a previously censorship clamped down the lid so tightly that the most massive troop movement in history of our country up to that time was made in the utmost secrecy.

General Pershing reached France on June 14. The following day the first of a group of troop ships transport sailed slowly from Staten Island, N. Y., bound for Liverpool. The signalmen of ships which left on June 14 and 15 were the first Division of Army regulars and the Fifth Regiment of U. S. Marines, and the first of these forces was landed at St. Nazaire on June 26.

These pioneers of the American Expeditionary Force crossed the Atlantic without a single disaster or loss of life due to enemy causes, although twice their ships were sighted by the enemy submarines. Other units followed until 250,000 men had been transported overseas without a single troop movement was reached in too great a degree to permit the enemy to learn of the movement. Troops were landed in one month, Everything was ready when the departure for the great adventure.

Citizens saw our soldiers on the trains at war camps, on troop ships and in cities and towns, but their presence in France was revealed only by cables from Paris. All of which carefully concealed the names of units, their numbers, strength and destination.

When the 27th Marines left the navy yard Philadelphia, its battalions were reviewed by the war time commandant, Major Gen. Feral Barnett, who gave them a brief word of farewell before they boarded trains for New York. Drums and bugles were silent, no flags were unfurled, and their departure was marked with such secrecy that a Associated Press staff man, practicing on a nearby diamond, continued to play ball, unaware that an epoch event was taking place only a few hundred yards away.

This silent exodus was in sharp contrast to the reception accorded the victorious A. E. F. when it returns returned from France, to march into which Alexander's truck crashed had been parked at the foot of the hill. A passenger, who was burning on the rear end, but the bright lights of an oncoming machine blinded Alexander and he did not see the parked truck.

Death Toll Cited In Cancer Fight

Representative Maury Maverick, Democrat, Texas, Thursday cited statistics on the number of cancer deaths to prove his contention that study of this modern scourge is the most important work facing the human race.

Figures from 187 American cities with a population of one-third of the nation's population revealed that the cancer death rate had climbed steadily during the last decade. The rate in 1926 was 110.3 deaths per 100,000 population, while last year the rate was 124.3.

Maverick is sponsoring a bill to appropriate $500,000 to set up a central cancer clinic at governmental expense and to spend $1,000,000 annually thereafter for research and study.

Carlisle Merchants Warned Against Itinerants With 'Advertising' Schemes

"An Editorial:

"A sticker," said Barnum or someone, "is born every minute." This writer is one of these, having been sold on more schemes against the purchase of which good judgment should NOT than the next one.

There are a lot of us like that, in country towns and in the cities too. We lack resolution; we are simply out talked, reduced to a state of hypnosis by clever sales talk, until we sign contracts and checks with the docility of a four-year-old child being coaxed a stick of candy in exchange for a highly prized toy. We bite, like suckers.

Now the newspaper business, on the advertising side, may be said to be infected with these traveling hypnotists, these glib-tongued salesmen. Nearly always their "Sidelight" or Sunday School page or whatever it may be is "contributing to a worthy cause" you will be told. Of course you are sure that you'll get lots of returns. Sometimes these schemes are good, sometimes they are absolutely worthless. But you may be sure of this: The salesman has no interest in you or in your community or its institutions. He is interested in getting your check and he will carry from three hundred to four-fifths of it out of town with him. That never fails to be true.

So for the Lord's sake, home folks, when some fast talking advertising space on a card to be picked in hotels and elsewhere, or any like scheme, comes around and you avoid falling into a hypnotic trance and signing contract or check too soon, call your counsel, your mayor, or the local paper can give you direct a great deal more service for the amount involved. These fellows are not in business for their health and their "takings" never see the town twice.

And remember, please, that if anyone tells you "We are working with Mr. Barnum," just ask him to show a letter signed by this writer or the news editor. We have a pen or two left, and we are sure of this: The salesman has not yet been commissioned to write the news or editorial page of a recreational director through WPA funds. Mr. Barnum's aide that no action would be taken on Carlisle's application until the beginning of the fiscal year on July 1, but promised to come to Carlisle two days each week to assist in starting the work.

A committee of three was formed and E. E. Pfanstiel was elected president, Rubye Scott vice-president and Robert Fisher secretary and treasurer. An executive committee will be appointed by the president and chairman of committees for various activities will be selected.

Court Approves Office Of Jailer

Highest Tribunal Holds Governor Had Authority To Include Bill In Call

The court of appeals Friday upheld the validity of the county jailers in Kentucky when it held that the act of the 1937 general assembly repealing a 1934 law that would have reduced the office with that of sheriff at the end of this term.

Suit was filed attacking the validity of repeal of the law which would have abolished the office of jailer. The suit was based on the illegality of consideration of the law at a special session of the legislature. It was contended that Governor Chandler had called the legislature to consider other measures and that the assembly was without authority to pass the repeal measure.

The decision of the court is of interest to hundreds of candidates for jailer throughout the state.

The advance sale of boxes and tickets for the Horse Show for the Junior League Horse Show to be held at the Trotting Track July 21 to 24 inclusive opened last week and members of the various committees report that many boxes have been reserved and that the season tickets are moving fast. If early interest in the show can be taken as an indication of the outcome it appears that it will be the most successful show staged in Kentucky in many years. It appears that more people in the Bluegrass are interested in this show than any outdoor event that has been staged here in a decade.
