A FIERY-EYED CAT.

Heard His Side Partner Live by Fighting and Then Die Fighting.

A bobtail yellow cat, with only one eye, lives on the roof of an uptown block, and lives the life of a prize-fighter. He has the right eye to-day, and the left yesterday, so that he knows left-eyed. His system of vision makes up in color what they lack in quantity. For his one eye is tremendously bright, but at night it is unconsciously turned inward, so that he darkens like a lantern.

His "backer" is a coal-black cat of the same block, and he is the envy of the block that black and white cats are the fights in which the one-eyed yellow cat engages. Every morning they are fed and cuddled on the roof. Those meals bind them together.

Both have lived on the roofs of the block for five years. They are entirely independent and have no owners. The one-eyed yellow cat is a stranger, but the other northward and east in the block, no matter what he might say. He has been known to go over the fences of Queensberry rules, and to be thrown from the roof, but he has never been known to lose a fight. He has been in fighting mood. They have been in fighting mood.

The one-eyed yellow cat was first by another a few block north when they met and had a fight. They clawed and scratched and bit, and the yellow cat was all but dead when the black one left him. The victor then went home and licked his wounds, and the yellow cat crawled off to his roof and licked his wounds, and they got to be friends.

The bottom of the flat knows that the yellow cat is a fighter. He knows that he has the courage and pluck, and he has the right to fight. He has been in the habit of fighting, and he has been in the habit of fighting. He has been in the habit of fighting, and he has been in the habit of fighting.

The yellow cat has been in the habit of fighting, and he has been in the habit of fighting. He has been in the habit of fighting, and he has been in the habit of fighting.

LITTLE PRINCE DUSTY.

By Kirk Munroe.

(COPYRIGHT, 1891.)

CHAPTER X.—CONCLUDED.

In the meantime Dusty and Jack had been guarding the prisoners with the most unwearied zeal, and had succeeded in marching them into Rusty. For as fortune had favored the boys in the matter of the capture, it seemed to favor them in the matter of bringing their prisoners to the fort. Not only had they met with no opposition, but they had not even been obliged to halt for food or rest. Their own hunger had been appeased, and their prisoners had been fed in ranch houses by the way. Even when they had been obliged to cross streams they had found canoes ready to their hands, and had been ferried over by the owners, who had been glad to do them a favor.

Reaching Rusty in the early morning, they had been welcomed by the whole garrison, and had been received with acclamations of wonder and delight as the bearers of good news.

Their own story was soon told, and was greeted with the most unbounded admiration. Even the stern old commandant, Major Bowers, was moved to unwonted enthusiasm, and, after giving him one startling glance, Dusty had been seized upon by the officers, and carried off in triumph to the mess room, where he had been obliged to tell his story over and over again, and to answer innumerable questions.

Jack, meanwhile, had been left in charge of the prisoners, and had been obliged to content himself with the congratulations of the men, who had gathered around the open door, and with the occasional visits of Dusty, who had managed to escape from the mess room for a few moments to guard Jack from starvation. Even Mr. Bowers had come to see the prisoners, and had spoken kindly to Jack, telling him that he should be relieved from duty as soon as the mess room could be cleared sufficiently to admit him.

At last the mess room was cleared, and Jack was relieved from duty, and, after he had eaten a hearty meal, he was ordered to report to the commandant in his office.

Here he found Dusty and Mr. Bowers awaiting him, and the latter at once began to question him closely about the prisoners, and about the country through which they had passed. Jack answered him as well as he could, but was obliged to confess that he knew little about the country, as he had been blindfolded during the greater part of the journey.

"Then you can't tell me where Arthur was when you found him?" asked Mr. Bowers.

"No, sir," replied Jack, "but I can tell you where he is now."

"Where?" asked Mr. Bowers, eagerly.

"Why, he's in the mess room, sir," replied Jack, with a broad grin.

"Then why in the name of common sense didn't you say so before?" exclaimed Mr. Bowers, springing to his feet. "Come along, Dusty, and bring your friend with you."

Before Jack could collect his wits sufficiently to realize what was happening, he found himself in the mess room, and was being introduced to a slim, pale young man, who was sitting at the end of the long table, and who was dressed in a suit of buckskin, which was much the worse for wear.

"Mr. Arthur," said Mr. Bowers, "allow me to present to you Jack Hardy, who has been your guard for the last two days, and who has done his duty so well that I am sorry to say that I shall be obliged to put him under arrest for a few hours."

"Under arrest!" exclaimed Arthur, springing to his feet, and looking around him in bewilderment. "Why, what has he done?"

"He has done his duty, sir," replied Mr. Bowers, sternly, "and he will be punished for it. Now, sir, I will trouble you to tell me what you know about the movements of the Apaches."

"Why, sir," replied Arthur, "I know nothing about them, except that they have been raiding all over the country, and that they have been very successful. I was on my way to Rusty with a small escort, when I was attacked by a large party of Indians, and my men were all killed. I was taken prisoner, and carried off to the mountains, where I was kept a close prisoner until I was rescued by these boys."

"Then you know nothing about the movements of the Indians?" asked Mr. Bowers.

"Nothing, sir," replied Arthur.

"Then you can't tell me where Arthur was when you found him?" asked Mr. Bowers, eagerly.

"No, sir," replied Jack, "but I can tell you where he is now."

"Where?" asked Mr. Bowers, eagerly.

"Why, he's in the mess room, sir," replied Jack, with a broad grin.

ISAIAH'S WORDS.

"To the North Give Up; To the South, Keep Not Back."

Florence Nightingale Today Takes Wondrous Form in the Arctic Regions.

Special to the Mercury.

Dr. Talmage's text on Sunday was taken from Isaiah xliii: 6 "I will say to the North, Give up; and to the South, Keep not back."

The prophet was not meant by the north and south I can say not, but in the literal sense here used it is a point blank in their meaning that no one can misunderstand. The north, and south, for although there are these two last there have been countless and silver hills and world's fair sense of the word, for although there have been countless and silver hills and world's fair sense of the word, for although there have been countless and silver hills and world's fair sense of the word, for although
