Capitol Comments

By David M. Porter

Kentucky, a state noted for its bourbon, for its colonels who appreciate and consume it and fortunate in the revenue that comes from it, may go dry. The storm forces in the state, alarmed by the number of counties (83) now dry and anxious to do something about it, carried their fight into this legislature and were successful. They passed a bill permitting counties that now vote under the unit plan, that is a county voting wet, the cities in that county are wet, but under the new law that they passed, a city may vote a separate part of the county wet while the county may be dry, the city of that county can be wet, sell beverages. This, in effect, will make it a wet county as the people from the county come into the cities to do their buying. The bill was carried through the House by a vote of 60-33 whether the Governor signs it or not, immediately after the bill was passed the bill was introduced in the House for a vote on state-wide prohibition. I believe the bill was handled as diplomatically and astutely as any legislation that was ever put to the House or Senate. Before the dry forces could become organized,* believe they seemed to realize what was happening, the bill was passed and through parliamentary procedure. There was no chance for debate, only a chance to express the vote.

The revenue from the manufacture and sale of whiskey amounts to about 1-3 of the general fund monies and I believe from experience and observation that all dry counties in Kentucky have bootlegging in them. I think that the elements of lawlessness and the underworld characters who take over when prohibition goes into effect should make us realize that prohibition cannot be successful. I believe that the dries should realize this and fight for proper legislation to restrict and limit the sale—perhaps through state-owned stores or possibly for medical purposes but definitely not have prohibition and the crime wave that go with it.

A bill for a soldier's bonus for members of the Armed Forces was introduced in the Senate last week. A bill to regulate the sale of poultry and eggs to protect poultry breeders from diseased and inferior grades of chickens was introduced by Senator Cox. Congressman Howes Meade is making a reputation in Washington that is stretching throughout the country. His fight for adequate money to permit war veterans to continue their college education is well known to Kentuckians. Last week his bill was successfully passed increasing the allotment of single students from $65.00 to $75.00 a month, and married students with dependents up to $120.00. Howse is a young Congressman serving his first term, has a lot of ability, and is well thought of by the members of both parties in Washington.
