NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC—This is to notify the public that the firm of Williams & Williams of Lexington, Ky., which was established in 1897, will continue under the same name as in the past. We will strive to render you the same efficient service and hold the profession up to the high standards set by our founders of the business.

We appreciate the patronage you gave the late William E. Price and Sterling H. Price, the latter of whom succeeded the professors in 1889 and was joined in 1897 by William E. Price, forming the Price Brothers establishment.

Sterling H. Price passed away in 1916, and at this time his sons, W. H. Price, H. M. Price and J. D. Price joined their uncle in the business. At the time of the death of W. H. Price and H. M. Price in 1943 their interest was purchased by J. N. Price, who has been associated with the firm until the present and will continue to be in the future, assisted by Gano Hankins.

Allison and Phyllis Harney, song leaders, lead us in the singing of several patriotic numbers—including Taps.

The fourth grade gave "In Flanders Fields" in concert. Mary Phyllis Smith was leader.

Mr. W. T. Straw then discussed the projects for the coming year and presented a state charter to the Club—Patsy Bramblett, Reporter.

Moorefield Homemakers

The Moorefield Homemakers met Tuesday afternoon, November 9, at the home of Mrs. Hamm Judge. Eight active members and one visitor, Miss Geneva Vice, were present.

Mrs. Fithian Rye demonstrated how to make easier by using the ironing the lap table. The members were taught to iron a man's shirt with minimum effort.

At the close of the meeting Mrs. Judge served refreshments.

More Cover Crops

Farm Agent J. R. Davie of Carlisle county estimates that 12,000 acres of cover crops have been seeded this fall, an increase of 50 percent over last year. He cites the case of George Wasson of Burkley, who, in 1947, seeded 35 acres to cover crops. This fall Wasson bought a 50-ton car of rock phosphate and applied it to 100 acres seeded to winter oats, fescue and ladino clover.

Just Plain Old 'Taters' Lauded As Worldwide Table Delicacy

By Dr. Gordon Wilson

Some historian has said that the settlement of America could never have advanced as it did but for the ease with which corn could be grown. It was not even necessary to clear completely the land; some trees could be cut down, the others girdled, and the corn planted out in the rough land.

A few scratchings with the hoe often sufficed to bring a fairly respectable crop, enough to furnish roasting ears and dry corn for later hominy and meal.

With corn for break, the pioneer with a gun could bring in enough meat to make, for that time, a well-balanced ration, especially since there were always so many wild berries and fruits and nuts to fall back on. Certainly corn played a great role in our pioneer life and still plays a very large one.

However great may be the place of corn, plain old potatoes seem now more important. After all, corn is largely American in its use, though the lower Danube valley and South Africa have their cornfields.

But potatoes are grown in nearly all the world, from the extreme north to the sub-tropics. And millions of people who never saw America have depended most of their lives on potatoes for a large part of their vegetable food. The peasantry of northern Europe would soon starve if potatoes ceased to be. And what, pray, would a modern eating place do without potatoes for every dinner or lunch?

A recent number of National Geographic Magazine contains a very attractive article on Aroostook county, Maine, that great treasure-house of the lowly spud. Idaho farmers find their way everywhere in the aristocrats, say the farmers who have seen, of the whole tribe. But after all, a large per cent of the potatoes that our country knows are grown in less well-known areas.

Thousands of "patches" of potatoes grace every section of our country. I had never realized how important these small patches were until I took an early-summer trip through the mountains areas of several states. Potatoes in full bloom vied with Dorothy Perkins roses for attention. No cottage was too poor to have its blooming little square of potatoes or its trailing rose bush with its pink flowers.

There is something in my Scotch makeup that responds to the appeal of the potato as well as to that of the rose. They represent two sides of my nature, the love for beauty and love for solid comfort in the shape of good food.

It is true that many of the small patches may not produce any potatoes comparable in size with the giants from Maine or Idaho, but they have the flavor of the actual soil around the houses where the growers live; they have sprung from the same sources as their owners.

And, though grown potatoes can be shipped across the continent, if need be, without particularly damaging their flavor or food value, there is "fetched-on" new potatoes each quite equal in quality the "grabbing" from one's own garden.

Maybe the grabbed taters just have more poetry in them, the poetry of the spring hoe, the sun and rain and rip in our own acres.

Somehow no planting in the spring seems more important than potato planting. Anyway, it can be done early, the earlier the better. After the last potatoes from the hilled-up bads are had from eaten, we used to see no more until the seed potatoes came on in our little stores at Fidelity.

Somehow Father managed to cut the potatoes so that there seemed be a good-sized core left after all the eyes were removed with sufficient meat beneath them to insure their growing normally. Those square pieces from the core over the large potatoes became about the most welcome dish after a period of some weeks when potatoes were not a part of our daily food.

Business firms in Lancaster contributed $215 for premiums for the county baby beef show.
