More For The Money

A feature story in the Wall Street Journal, signed by Ray Vicker of the newspaper's staff, tells of what is happening in the nation's great farm equipment industry. The emphasis is on cost-cutting all along the line—engineering and new product development being about the only exceptions. Mr. Vicker quotes one spokesman as saying, "Manufacturing efficiency must and is being improved." Another said, "We are doing everything we can think of to cut costs." A third expressed a similar view with a quip: "Maybe we should turn out the lights and save on electricity while we talk."

The reason for this is obvious enough. The drops that have taken place in farm income and some farm prices have found their reflection in reduced purchasing of equipment. And the industry's response is the intelligent one—to try to give more for the money.

This also is indicative of the highly competitive nature of the farm equipment business. Every manufacturer and its dealers want a better product to offer than the competition can present—and is trying to develop it.

As for future prospects, it's about as sure as anything can be that farmers will buy as much equipment as their resources will permit. For the machine, above all else, is the key to successful, profitable farming today.

Selling Is The Answer

An article in a recent issue of Newsweek magazine should interest consumers.

It began: "The business is there. It's up to us to go out and get it. That's the way most of the nation's producers and retailers are reacting these highly competitive days."

Newsweek then dealt with some of the tools retailers and others will use intensively to attract customers. Advertising is the biggest factor here, and in many cases is being increased. Stores are being spruced up and when possible prices are being cut. And sales forces are being bolstered.

Aggressive, intelligent selling is part of the American genius. The prime example was the development of our vast system of mass-distribution, which made mass-production "workable." Lyrics have jeered at the salesman and the salesman-mentality. But the fact remains that selling—which simply means moving the largest possible quantities of goods into the hands and homes of the ultimate consumers—has been largely responsible for our employment, earnings, and living standards.

At the end of its article, Newsweek made this significant observation. "Success in the current selling drive may well spell the difference between prosperity or bust." American enterprise has long been preparing for the conditions that prevail today, and is convinced that it can do the needed job.

BLADES of BLUEGRASS

By Jack Wild

The other day my office received word that a Kentucky high school group wanted to visit the University of Kentucky. Now ordinarily there is nothing unusual about our getting such a request because this office—the Public Relations Department—often takes visiting groups on tours of the campus.

But this one was different. It was from the Kentucky School for the Blind, Louisville. A group of five students planned to come to SEE the campus!

The boys arrived on a Saturday morning with their instructor, I. P. Howser, and we could hear them laughing and joking as they made their way up the steep stairs of the old Administration Building. Three of them were completely blind and two could see only slightly, but they were boys all the same and they were eager to "get going" on the tour.

Arm and arm and without the traditional white canes of the blind, the boys strolled across the campus, taking curbings and stairways in their stride. At the Engineering Quadrangle, Prof. Everett Elzey showed them through electrical, mechanical, and civil engineering laboratories, stopping now and then to describe some interesting feature. The boys were intensely interested, they asked intelligent questions, and they learned what the various pieces of machinery were like by feeling of them.

As is true with all youngsters who come to the campus for the first time, they were anxious to visit Stoll Field and the Memorial Coliseum. A cinder track rims the football field and the boys were not satisfied until they had run around it. They were awed by the size of the Coliseum, and they asked that the names of the World War II dead from their counties be read to them. They were disappointed that no one was available who could talk to them about wrestling, a favorite sport of theirs.

Those five lads probably "saw" things on the University of Kentucky campus better through their fingertips than most of us would have seen them through our eyes. It was an inspiration to have such attentive and cheerful visitors.

UK Faculty Member Is 'Micro' Author

Mrs. Ellen B. Stutsman, head cataloger in the University of Kentucky's Margaret I. King Library, is the author of a "microcard" book, which must be read through a microscope or some other special instrument. According to Mrs. Stutsman, microcards are simply contact prints of photographs of entire pages of books on 35 millimeter film. Fifty pages can be printed on a three by five card and the average book will fit on three to six cards. Title of the volume is "Development of Library Cataloging of Kentucky Official Documents." It is part of a series edited by Dr. Lawrence S. Thompson, director of the University Libraries, and published by the University of Rochester Press.

By your Congressman John C. Watts

Excess Wheat Penalty

Of interest to many farmers in the District, will be the letter I received on March 8 from the Commodity Stabilization Service clarifying the penalty provision for planting excess wheat. The producers of excess wheat acreage will not be penalized if the excess wheat while still green is turned under, pastured off, cut for hay or silage. The Administrator wrote me:

"In order to best illustrate the effect of this (penalty) provision, let us assume that a producer has been notified of a wheat acreage allotment of 20 acres for his farm. However, he plants 30 acres of wheat which results in excess acreage for the farm. This excess acreage will not be considered as 'wheat acreage' if it is, while still green, turned under, pastured off, or cut for hay or silage."

Economic Outlook

Are we heading into a depression? This is the question that businessmen all over the country are asking. If the Democrats call danger signals, the Republicans label them the prophets of "gloom and doom." The Democrats in turn say the Republicans are not willing to recognize the mounting emergency.

Is there a basis for such fearful talk? Certainly experience has shown us the unjustified fear of an economic decline can make much more serious economic adjustments. Everyone has a right to ask what are the facts?

Industrial production in February dipped to 123 of the 1947-1949 average as compared to 137 for July 1953. This is a 10 per decline in industrial production. This is a drop equal to the maximum decline in the 1948-49 recession.

Steel production is down. For the week ended March 6, steel was being produced at a rate of 70.5% of capacity as compared to 100.3% of capacity for the like week in 1953. In tonnage for these same weeks this is a drop from 2,262,000 tons to 1,682,000 tons.

Business and commercial failures are up. The "New York Times" reported 104 failures for the week ended March 6 as compared to 170 for the like week in 1953.

The production of soft coal in the months January-February 1953 was approximately 74 million tons but was down to 63 million tons for the like months in 1954 . . . a decline of 11 million tons.

Unemployment has been steadily increasing and was recorded at 3.1 million on January 15. On March 8 of this week, Secretary of Labor James Mitchell asked Congress to increase the funds for the Labor Department. The Department expects a continued increase in unemployment in the next fiscal year and will need the additional money in order to pay unemployment compensation benefits.

Net farm income in 1953 was 7.5% below farm income for 1952.

Department store sales, in contrast, are holding up. The months January-February, 1954, show only a 1% decline over January-February, 1953.

In January the President said he thought March would be the key month. If the economic picture does not look up when the figures for March are tallied, the Administration will probably recommend some pump priming measures to bolster the economy. Yoy may be assured that your Congressman is concerned about the nation's economic health and that he is carefully watching inventory accumulations, production indices, and economic indicators.
