Follow Directions With Care When You Use Parathion

Parathion can be deadly, so use it very carefully, warns Dr. R.A. Scheibener, Extension entomologist with the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, Lexington.

Parathion is one of the insecticides that probably will be more widely used now that DDT use is restricted, he points out. And parathion must be handled with care. A 180-pound man can be killed by less than half a teaspoon of parathion concentrate if it is spilled on his skin and not washed off.

Because of concern about possible danger to the environment, DDT and similar insecticides are no longer recommended for many of the purposes they were used for in the past, Scheibner continues. In fact, in Kentucky, it is against the law to use DDT except for bat, rat, mouse and termite control.

Growers now must use insecticides other than DDT that will not harm the environment but will still handle their insect problems without costing so much that they can't afford to use them. And many of these other insecticides, such as parathion, are very dangerous to the people who come in contact with them.

Although relatively few cases of parathion poisoning have been reported, these may increase as this insecticide is used more often, especially by people who have not used it much before. So be sure you read all directions on the label and follow them exactly when you use parathion.

Federal and state agencies and the pesticide industry are now cooperating in a parathion safety education program, Scheibner notes. The pesticide industry has changed product labels to make directions clearer and the warnings stronger. Parathion manufacturers are also providing pesticide dealers with warning signs which will be given to persons who buy parathion; users should post these signs around parathion-treated fields.

If you buy parathion, you probably will be asked to fill out a card stating that the dealer has told you about the dangers of this insecticide, that you understand paration is to be used only according to label directions, and that you will post signs in fields where parathion is used with the signs provided by the dealer.

State and federal agencies will check dealers to make sure they are explaining the use of parathion to buyers and giving out the warning signs. These agencies also will educate the dealers about parathion and pass on new information about the safety program.

Kentucky, as yet, does not have a pesticide dealers' licensing law, so locating all the sellers of parathion is sometimes difficult for the agencies that check dealers. Scheibner notes. And, since dealers do not have to prove their knowledge of pesticides, some may not be qualified to carry out the responsibilities that go along with selling parathion.

For example, a case was recently reported where a dealer sold a man parathion in place of methyl parathion, telling him they were the same chemical with different trade names. Parathion and methyl parathion are not the same chemical and their effect on different crops is not the same, although they are closely related and are both very hazardous, he says.

Since some dealers may not explain the use of parathion when he sells it, you--the buyer--should be sure you understand the dangers of parathion and handle it safely, whether or not you are warned by the person who sells it to you. And, if the dealer does not give you the warning signs for your fields, ask him to get them for you; then post the signs wherever you use this insecticide.

Many common materials can cause poisoning, so be careful when you use any chemical compounds. Scheibner, points out that, in four recent years of records in Florida, all pesticides combined (insecticides, rodenticides, herbicides, etc.) were involved in about 9 percent of the poisoning cases. Of the total number of poisoning cases, 65 percent involved medicines and 18.5 percent were caused by household cleaners, polishes, etc.

With National Farm Safety Week scheduled later this month, he suggests that you make sure you and your family follow safety rules for using all materials on your farm and around your home.

Summer time is cook-out time, and there need not be a special occasion, just a pretty day and a little thought to perk up lagging appetites.

Here are some suggestions.

MARINATED DRUMSTICKS

1/4 cup catsup
2 to 3 tablespoon lemon juice
2 tablespoons Soy Sauce
1/4 cup salad oil
1/2 teaspoon monosodium glutamate

Combine ingredients, add 12 chicken drumsticks. Let marinate several hours, seeing that chicken is covered or turning occasionally so all of drumstick is covered. Can be marinated over night.

When ready to cook, grill over slow coals about 25 minutes, basting with marinade. Turn, cook 25 minutes or until tender. Baste often.

STUFFED BURGERS

Make out ground beef patties thinner than usual.

Center one pattie with a tablespoon of diced cheese and pickle relish. Or use cheese and diced onion, or cheese and a dash of barbeque sauce. Top with second meat patte. Seal edges well. Brush with melted margarine and broil, turning once. Season with salt and pepper.

BACON-FRANKS

Cut lengthwise slit in frankfurters, not quite through. Spoon mustard or catsup in slits; fill slits with strips of cheese. Or, fill slits with drained sauerkraut. Wrap each frank with a strip of bacon, anchoring ends with toothpicks.

Broil over hot coals, turning to crisp bacon, and heat through. Serve in hot buttered buns.

* * * * * *

Now for vegetables to serve with that outdoor meal.

CHEESE POTATOES

3 large baking potatoes, peeled
4 or 5 slices bacon, crisp cooked
1 large onion, sliced
about 2 cups sharp cheese
1/2 cup butter

Slice potatoes onto a big piece of foil and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Crumble bacon over. Add onion and cheese cubes, slice butter over all. Mix on the foil; bring edges up, leaving space for steam and expansion, seal well with double fold.

Place package on grill. Cook over coals about 1 hour or until done, turning several times. Should serve six.

HOT TOMATOES

Cut tomatoes in half. Brush cut surfaces with Italian Salad Dressing, or oil and vinegar dressing; sprinkle with salt, pepper and basil. Place cut side up on foil over hot coals about 10 minutes. Do not turn.

CORN

Don't forget corn buttered, salt and pepper. Wrap in foil and cook on grill. Try acron squash cut in half, seeds removed, wrapped in foil, season with butter, salt and pepper. If you are grilling slices of ham, serve sweet potatoes wrapped in foil and cooked on the grill. Do allow about an hour for these vegetables. Remember if you are using a variety of vegetables, select those that require the same cooking time.

To me the best bread for an outdoor meal is the cooked French bread, sliced thick, and buttered with garlic butter. Wrap in foil and heat on back of grill.

SALAD

For a no mess, no bother salad serve crunchy relishes. Green onions, celery and carrot strips, radishes, pickles and olives.

For dessert there are many cakes that carry well. However avoid custard pies and cream fillings.

For fun buy an Angle Food cake, cut into cubes and toastover dying fire or the cubes are good dipped into chocolate syrup or any ice cream topping.

Don't forget to make ahead, gallons of ice tea.

Have fun, eat out. It is later than you think.

Outdoor Lore

By Nevyle Shackelford • University of Kentucky College of Agriculture

Long before Little Red Riding Hood's famous escape, or before the Three Little Pigs discovered that brick was a more substantial building material than straw or sticks, storytellers made the wolfe the classical villain of the animal world. Down through the ages its image in literature, music, and folklore has been that of a big, bad varmint, powerful, merciless, and cunning, and an associate of witches, warlocks, and vampires.

But according to wildlife experts and others who have had experiences with wolves, the truth lies elsewhere. While it is true that wolves, on occasion, do kill and eat domestic livestock such as sheep, cattle, and chickens, authenticated records of this legendary animal attacking humans in Canada and the United States are virtually unknown.

As a consequence of their undeserved reputation, wolves have been hunted, trapped, and poisoned with a vengance since the founding of this nation. Now as a result of this persecution, combined with the reduction of their environment, the Department of Interior's Bureau of Sport Fisheries and Wildlife says the wolf is an endangered species.

These "gray ghosts" originally ranged over the entire continent of North America. Today, except for Alaska, few states have any wolves at all. Legal protection has been given the wolf throughout most of its historical range, but in most cases it came too late and man now seldom hears nature's most thrilling grand opera, the wolfpack chorus.

Wildlife authorities say this spine-tingling chorus was responsible for much wolf legend, and little was needed to invent all the frightening stories about it. For the wolves, however, howling is a social event somewhat like a community sing. Besides howling for the mere fun of it, they make a wide variety of other vocal sounds for communication.

A glaring modern misnomer is the term "wolf" when applied to humans. Instead of being a carefree Don Juan, the real male wolf is a faithful, devoted mate. He not only provides food for his family, but also takes equal responsibility with his mate in the training and protection of the pups. Wolves mate for life, forming a closely knit family group. The females are exemplary as wives and mothers, and biologists believe the wolf's mysterious system of birth control allows it to bear only as many young as the environment can support.

Although maligned as a stock killer, game biologists say the wolf's principal food in its habitat is wild animals. Deer, caribou, moose, rabbits, and small rodents are favorite menu items. They prey mainly on the old, weak, or diseased animals and thus contribute to the health of game populations. By aiding in the reduction of wildlife to the carrying capacity of its food supply, they also help keep game ranges in good condition.

It is the consensus of game biologists and wildlife conservationists that we need wolves, and probably more than we think. If those remaining are to be saved, they add, there must be a change of heart. The archaic and discredited bounty system on wolf pelts must be removed, wilderness areas where there is no conflict with livestock interests must be restocked, and remnant populations must be located and preserved in their environment.
