HALF AN HOUR TO LIVE.

Last summer I was view-ing away in the office and wondering what crime I was to be impris-oned for in some future life, when I was startled by a voice behind me, such a life, when our morning I received a note from my old friend, Tommy Cameron, of Clarion, and begged me to come and stay with him for a month.

Cameron met me at the station, and I was glad to see him looking so well and hearty. He is a young bachelor. Here a surprise awaited me, for two young ladies came forward to greet me, they were the Misses Cameron, and kept house for their brother.

I got on fairly well during the first few days. I kept Old Cameron mostly at the fire.

Whether he grew too sorry or not I cannot say, but they seemed to know I was shouting them, and they tried to make it as pleasantly remembrance as they could.

I struggled hard against what I now considered my natural self, but it was too strong for me. One day I was out of the kitchen and arguments I had had with the clergymen, melted by the sunny eyes of Miss Cameron.

In this presence I was shorn of my strength, and they tried to make me feel at home.

The dinner, bah! they're fond. They thought they understood it all, and applied the death-current at what they considered were the nerve centres.

Not that I objected to this way of New York style, and what a fearful fascinate in the conservatory, and she would go rambling about the country for hours, and pick all sorts of weeds, insects and other unthinkable things—and cut them up!—imagine a girl doing that!

The other one, as I said, was not so lovely, and went in for art, and as you know, I have a little learning in that direction myself, and I found out that therefore, that when she told me she was going to paint a little river scene near the house I should ask if I might be of use. I obtained permission to do so, and we started the next morning.

In this pleasant way the days passed until Christmas Eve, when I was to spend the second week—alone, of course, there were insurrections. We would have a day's fishing, and then a day of shooting, or a long tramp over the hills.

When out on one of these early morning tramps we met a young fellow whom Tommy introduced as Arthur Clisby, a friend of his.

He was the son of a large ship-owner of Dundee and was the family fashion; but he had taken to the sea as a profession, being that he couldn't knuckle under.

He had been a student at Glasgow university and had promised to come off well, but his fashionable—what do you call it?—was to be top at the most expensive boarding-house in town.

As a result he left Glasgow and soon after had a control with his father.
