Tree planting season is here, seedlings available

Tree planting season is here again. Nicholas County contains numerous areas which are not in productive use. Some are abandoned pasture, worn out cropland, areas too steep to cultivate or too steep for mowing. Still others consists of small parcels cut off by creeks or ditches, or simple idle areas which could be used more productively.

There is even natural woodland which has been so badly mistreated by fire, livestock grazing, or mismanagement that it is no longer considered productive. Where such conditions exist, the Nicholas County Conservation District recommends that tree planting be considered.

Tree seedlings are available at low cost from the Kentucky Division of Forestry. Contact your conservation district office for a tree seedling order form. For further information please call 289-2234 or visit the local office at 605 Moorefield Road, Carlisle, Kentucky.

Poverty.....

term difference is a stress on early childhood programs of the Head Start variety."

He states the state needs to get a state consensus on priorities for action.

Each section in the state plans its own future, with not enough concern for the entire state's needs, he says.

Hodgkinson suggest a systematic attack on the one issue of rural poverty, pulling together local, county and state leadership working together on a strategy focussed on early childhood preschool programs.

"Given the very small number of people who move to and from the state, tomorrow's Kentucky is clearly today's Kentucky if you wait a bit.

"Higher education would have to publicly support programs of early childhood education as a major solution for the long term," Hodgkinson writes.

Kirby enters culinary program to become chef

Pamela Faye Kirby, a native of Carlisle, Kentucky wants to join the ranks of the famous culinary masters who perform their delicious magic daily at some of the finest restaurants in the world.

Pamela has enrolled in the culinary arts program at the National center for Hospitality Studies at Sullivan College in Louisville, Kentucky. That National Center offers students degrees in Culinary Arts, Hotel and Restaurant Management and Travel and Tourism.

While in the culinary program at the National Center, students take a hands-on approach to their craft. They prepare meals daily in the state-of-the-art facilities at the center, learning everything from slicing and dicing to the creation of recipes. After several months of initial training, they are placed in the cafeteria kitchens to prepare the daily meals that are served to the student body of the college.

The students are taught by a highly experienced culinary staff. Three-quarters of the staff are certified culinary experts, including one of only a handful of Master Pastry Chefs in the country. The staff brings with it 168 years of culinary experience.

At the end of the two-year program, the students will have earned an Associate Degree in Science, something no other private culinary school can offer.
