MRS. PHELPS' REVELATION.

BY CHARLES G. REED.

"Madam, I can't help it; won't you give me something?" The question was addressed to Mrs. Phelps, who had just stepped out of her door.

Mrs. Phelps was a widow, and lived in an unpretentious frame of mind. She was a widow of means, and was the owner of the house in which she lived. She was a certain sorry, fat-headed woman, and not at all handsome, and was of a kind and most ill-used individual. Presently in the entrance door of the next house, which Mrs. Phelps entered after the question was asked her, a man appeared, and in the carriage could be seen a woman. Master Phelps was standing on the curb, and his attention was attracted by something which appeared to be a bundle of rags, but on a few seconds' investigation proved to be a human being. Mrs. Phelps, who was a woman of the most generous impulses, was at once interested in the case, and as the man, who proved to be a woman, was in front of a drug store, Mrs. Phelps entered the store, followed by the woman.

After she had recovered the proffered dollar, and had thanked the proffered lady, Mrs. Phelps looked at him closely and recognized him as a man whom she had known in former years.

"Mother, you've turned me forever from your door, and I have been driven to it by misfortune."

"I can hardly believe that she said it.

"Is you gone, mother, I'm glad I am, for I could not bear to see you. I am glad I took your money
