The Carlisle Mercury/Josh Shepherd Photo

Brian Anderson, unfortunately, was unableto stand before the ribbon-winning produce he entered in the Nicholas County Fair. Nor does a black and white photograph enhance its look. But, readers, rest assured that it did not diminish the effect a spread of fresh grown vegetables has on the Carlisle Mercury photographer's appetite.

New septic tank inspection law in effect

All Kentuckians building homes or other buildings that use septic systems for waste treatment will have to get a permit from their local health department before installing the septic system. This requirement went into effect July 15.

Since July 1986, Kentuckians building homes on 10 or more acres of agriculture-zoned land with buildings for farm use and a registered crop base could be exempted form installing a local health department-approved septic system.

Because of changes in Kentucky law, those exemptions will no longer be issued for septic systems.

According to Larry Trussell; Sanitarian of the Nicholas County Health Department, this means that all newly constructed buildings using a septic system in Nicholas County will be required to instal a health department-approved septic system.

"Now septic system permits will be required for all new home construction in Kentucky," said Trussell, "regardless of whether they are being built on farm property or not."

To receive a permit, people considering building a home must contact an environmentalist at the local health department to do a site evaluation before construction of the home begins.

"The environmentalist will sample the soil and make recommendations on the types of systems that will meet state regulations," He said.

Once the homeowner decides on the kind of system to use, a certified septic system installer does a drawing to reflect the system being installed.

The health department environmentalist must approve the drawing and issue a construction permit giving authority to actually install the system.

The environmentalist then visits the site at least once during installation and makes a final inspection after being notified that the system is complete.

"If all the regulations are met and the system is installed according to the construction permit, a final approval is issued," Trussell said.

Nicholas Countians with questions about the process can contact Larry Trussell at 606-289-7000 any Monday thru Friday 8 a.m. to 12 p.m. or 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m.
