the restaurant did terrific business before it closed. It just didn't stay open all the time," Ramey said.

If everything goes as planned, Ramey said they hoped to be open and running March 15. However, that estimate, Bibby said, is a big "if".

"We're still in the process of assessing the physical repairs needed for the restaurant. We know there needs to be some water pipe replacements in the building and the swimming pool needs some attention," Bibby said.

Although plans for the purchase have been signed and money has, as yet, changed hands. But hopefully, we can get the rest of the details behind us and start on setting up operations," Ramey said.

With the Business After Five question suddenly taking on unexpected turn, Ramey explained that he and his partner feel the restaurant has a much greater money-making potential that went unexplored by Carnico's previous managers.

"We only have to review the receipts during the times Carnico was open to see that chase have not been finalized, both men outlined their ideas for running the restaurant.

The dining rooms would be available for private parties and various other functions. But the brunt of their business, they said, would be a full-service public restaurant offering breakfasts, lunches and dinners.

Having dispelled, at least temporarily, the concerns over the fate of the 19th Hole, they said they intended on maintaining the restaurant's established name, Ramey and Bibby entertained questions and introductions from the business people in town.
