Health care

to Lexington, without any money with which to do it." But, according to Miller, that's not the only problem with Medicaid - or the current state system for that matter.

"Medicaid is limited to the number of people they can let into the system, only about half of which are eligible can be let into the system. [Medicaid registers] are mostly made up of very young children and women," Miller said.

"Many males qualify but are not placed on Medicaid rolls. They feel males should be working - even if they are too sick to work, or there are simply no jobs available."

In short, Miller believes many components of the present health care system in the state of Kentucky are discriminatory.

"From our viewpoint, ours being JMHC, we feel the system is discriminatory and we have entered into three lawsuits because we feel current laws concerning healthcare are unconstitutional," Miller said.

He explained the first lawsuit concerned taxation.

"We are a charitable corporation, yet we are taxed. Why do we have tax exempt status if we are not tax exempt?" Miller asked.

"The second lawsuit concerns Medicaid. According to the law, Medicaid must pay a reasonable cost for health care, currently, they are not doing that.

"And thirdly, the state government passed a law which says a fund called the Indigent Care Fund would be distributed to all hospitals. We serve everyone, regardless of their ability to pay and most of the time we end up eating the cost of that care. This state law said that some of those costs would be taken care of by the Indigent Care Fund - so far we haven't received a nickel.

"I guess the state government could finance those extra 200,000 people they would like to put on Medicaid - by withholding payments due [for indigent care or by not paying a reasonable price for Medicaid services rendered]."

Miller also addressed the type of system JMHC would support.

"We support any system which is broad based, meaning health care providers in rural and inner city as well as urban or suburban receive the same consideration," Miller said.

"We also support universal access. Everyone should have the same opportunities to be insured, and everyone does not mean the exclusion of rural people. On many proposals, rural people are getting the short end of the stick, and they will be forced to travel to urban or suburban locations to get medical attention. That's discrimination.

"Historically, and notably since 1966, urban health care providers have been favored in the system, rural providers got less money for providing the same service. This makes it more difficult for us to compete. We not only make it by on less dollars, we do it more efficiently because we do it for less."

On the federal level, Miller said President Clinton's Health Care Reform proposal is complex - and the intense complexity of these across the board changes make it difficult to forecast possible impact on rural locations.

"His plan keeps changing, what's happening today may not be in the cards tomorrow. And Clinton's plan is just one of many - you have a Republican Plan, a Democratic Plan, a liberal plan, a conservative plan and a rural coalition plan - all different, all influenced by different concerns," Miller said.

In the current federal system, as in the state, urban and suburban health care providers are favored.

"The rural and inner city health care providers, with large pockets of elderly and poor get the short end of the stick," Miller said.

"I believe President Clinton's intent is to equalize the system - to his credit - much like the Kentucky Education Reform Act has made an attempt at equalizing education.
