program to help you," Riddell said.

Certified community status will allow communities to broaden the areas they work with. "We done it because many cities were small and couldn't do it alone. So instead of calling it certified city, it made more sense to call it certified community."

Another change will be that communities are no longer graded. They will be assessed so strengths and weaknesses can be dealt with individually.

The rest of the new program agenda cited:

• Written assessment will concentrate on the following theme - leadership, planning, commitment, partnership development and of course, education.

• Resource teams comprised of more than 30 agencies and organizations will be sent in to evaluate the communities after written assessment has been completed. They will help communities develop a relevant plan of action. Certification will be based on progress made on the plan of action.

• This year begins Phase I of the program, with approximately five communities randomly selected to participate.

• Once Phase I has been completed and assessed, Phase II will begin in January.

Phase II lets more communities participate in the certified community program.

Results of Phase I are expected in November, Riddell said. "You'll be asked where you want to be. You'll set your own standards."

Crucial to the new program is the assessment/resource team process which will identify strengths and weaknesses of each community. The team will be comprised of program partners who will work individually with the community to enhance its development. The program pamphlet stated, "From leadership training to workforce development, it is imperative that communities identify their needs, and are then directed to the proper sources to receive assistance to address those needs. Recognizing that each of our communities has unique strengths and assets, our resource teams will work with community leaders to develop plans of action to allow communities to take integral steps toward reaching their own community's goals and objectives."

Health Care Reform: Physician Referrals and Patient Rights

By Dan Miller
JMHC Administrator

As a patient and an individual, you have the right to choose where you go for medical treatment.

In the 20 years that I have been involved with Health Care administration, there has always been some confusion about the relationship between a health care institution like Johnson Mathers Health Care and local physicians As Health Care Reform becomes more and more a reality in Kentucky, I am concerned that people may become even more confused over this issue As the primary health care provider for this area, JMHC must take the responsibility to clarify these issues so that our patients are as fully informed about health care as possible

Outpatient Testing and Treatments

Johnson Mathers Health Care honors orders for tests and treatments by any duly licensed physician in Kentucky. Patient's always have the choice of where they receive services. Physician's are required by law to honor any patient's choice for hospital services and may not require that these services be performed in any specific hospital or clinic

Physicians are not required to have Medical Staff privileges at JMHC if they are ordering outpatient diagnostic tests and treatments. These tests or treatments may include laboratory and X-ray tests, respiratory and physical therapy treatments, mammography and EKG or any of the other ancillary services offered at JMHC

Emergency Room, Inpatient Admission, Nursing Home Admission, and Surgical Procedures

Any physician who wishes to perform Inpatient Hospital or Nursing Home admissions, Emergency Room or Surgical Services, at JMHC must apply for those specific privileges After a thorough investigation of the credentials of each physician, JMHC may then grant their request JMHC is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Health Care Organizations (JCAHO) and uses standards approved by the JCAHO for matters relating to granting physicians privilege to treat inpatients at this facility
