WHEN MOTHER TUCKED US IN.

Our little bedroom, "the nursery" we called it then, for we, and Ned passed down to it, stood all up the river. This grew to be more relied, but was still in a distinct one locality. For aught I know, other boats were in the vicinity and answered for the scale of anyone who might appear.

Accordingly I carefully and attentively picked out my sleep, selected in front of the time and always kept my elbow to the protection of my head or larger tree. Nothing on signs of life rewarded my efforts. I was about to resume when the bills. I could hear some disturbance, and was finally brought up short by hasty pressing into a corner of the spandrels. They had built a small fire and were attempting the peculiar and that our excited pack of mules had spilled. All were so busily engaged in eating, however, that I was unperceived. I retreated carefully, and determined that they had posted one, or, and sent a rifle ball whizzing by my ear. I then, much too close for comfort, I concluded that I had better retire to the higher ground and notice strategy. I had a good start, and kept in advance of the main body of guerillas. Three or four shots were sent after me, but all apparently fell short. I continued travelling, scarcely knowing how or where, but at length came out upon the shore of glade. I had run in a circle of about six miles in circumference, and had arrived at the place where the mules had disappeared. I was so exhausted that I could scarcely move.

Under the circumstances, I concluded that my best course would be to remain where I was, and wait for the return of the guerillas. I could hear them in the distance, and from their shouts knew that they were in pursuit of me. I determined to defend myself to the last extremity, and, if overpowered, to sell my life as dearly as possible. I had two pistols and a rifle, and was a good shot. I could kill four or five of the Indians, although their cries were becoming nearer. I looked over the edge of the foothills, expecting to see some one emerging, and to my intense relief I apparently discovered by the flying dust, a troop of cavalry from the fort. I could make out the tints of their uniforms, and finding I have seen, that the troop was as pleasing as that army time. The fort was only about 20 miles away, and word had been received that afternoon that a party of Sioux had left the fort, escaped and were on the warpath. Every available man had been sent out in pursuit, and the garrison was left in charge of a few invalids and recruits. Hearing the firing, the Apaches had at once fled, leaving five dead on the ground.

When they saw they were surrounded by the soldiers, they submitted without a struggle. They were were taken away from them, and they were forced to return to their reservation. I, therefore, it is true, lost without further loss.

Thus ended my first experience with Indians. Although I have since had many, I am happy to say, to be the hero of such a scrape as much as, in fact, that I remember with pleasure as one of the most delightful and restored to a civilized region.—Privately Mr. Mayne.

"YEAR PITS" OF THE DEER.

Grounds for the Years' Claims That a Stag Weeps.

Both the poets and the prose writers of imaginative or contemplative turn of mind have been attended by the tears shed by stags and other wounded creatures of the forest. Longfy, say that the Lesser Republic. Shakespeare put it in this way in describing the injured stag. The big round tears

Coursed one another down his innocent nose

In piteous chase.

These, in, of course, more pretty than truth is. These references to the tears of stags have been by members of the deer family, yet it is a fact that such animals are provided with a curious set of organs, the action of which has given rise to the tear shedding belief. The organ in question is the lachrymal sinus or "tear sac" which is situated just below each eye. It is a kind of closed cavity, capable of being opened and closed at will by the animal. It is lined with a glandular tissue, and the secretion provided with this curious lining is not tears, but a kind of wax, for the sake of softening the wax of the ear. This secretion, when first exposed, is escapes as tears would out of the eyes and down the face.

The uses of this queer set of material are not known, but it is probably connected with the development.

AGGRIEVED DISAPPOINTED

He Changed His Way Boarding, But the Newly Named Are Scanty.
