PREJUDICE from 4

With him go the prayers of his teachers and friends. He's good at different things now. He has more understanding of the world about him. He is able to do mathematical computations, knows something of the scientific approach to problem solving. He can read and write in at least the English language, an has probably developed some skills in typing, woodworking, art and driving an automobile. He is still allergic to baths, bedtime, taking out the trash and coming the first time he's called.

He still needs to be taught and loved, but perhaps not spanked. He needs to be reminded of the adult responsibilities of adult membership in the American society, to uphold the ideals of good citizenship, integrity, honesty, justice, humility and priority of life. He needs to realize that the completely successful life involves a partnership with his family, his community and his God. He should be told that education is a never ending process and only begins at the schoolhouse door. After having him in our classes and on our nerves, we are not the same! We're better people, enriched by his presence, broader in our understanding of humanity for having known him. We think we have provided him with an unbounded opportunity to learn in an atmosphere that has as its principle purpose the development of well informed citizens who carry on the great traditions of America. We love him, too. Written also with prejudice."

Signed, his principal.

To amplify my own sentiments with respect to this excellent article, every freedom loving American needs to take a positive attitude towards the schools in this nation and do what we can to make them better in the years to come.

Lawmakers adjourn 2001 legislative session

Kentucky lawmakers adjourned the 2001 legislative session March 22, closing out a groundbreaking session made possible last year when Kentucky voters approved a constitutional amendment requiring the General Assembly to meet each year.

Over the course of the session, lawmakers passed bills to clean up abandoned industrial sites, improve the state's mine safety efforts, made efforts to prevent racial profiling at police departments and crack down on people who make bomb threats against schools.

A glimpse at some of the legislation approved during the session follows:

Brownfields. Senate Bill 2 will encourage the cleanup of abandoned industrial sites known as brownfields. These sites are often considered environmentally damaging eyesores that can hinder development and hurt efforts to revitalize areas.

These sites are sometimes left neglected and unused because owners fear cleaning up the sites and putting them into use could prompt lawsuits from the state demanding further cleanup efforts.

SB 2 would eliminate that problem by ensuring the state couldn't sue a property owner and demand further cleanup efforts once a site has been cleaned to the satisfaction of the Cabinet for Natural Resources.

Bomb threats. House Bill 1 will stiffen penalties against anyone who makes a bomb threat to a school or public building. The legislation will make the crime a felony.

Racial profiling. Senate Bill 76 will require more police departments throughout Kentucky to establish policies that prohibit officers from engaging in racial profiling, or stopping people for questioning based on their race.

Last year, Gov. Patton issued an executive order prohibiting racial profiling by Kentucky State Police. SB 76 goes a step further by prohibiting racial profiling in any law enforcement agency that receive police salary supplements from the state.

Driving safety. Senate Bill 155 will help make nighttime driving safer by ensuring large trucks have proper lighting and reflectors.

According to the legislation, truckers that drive with missing lights or reflectors - or with lights and reflectors that aren't visible due to mud and debris - face a $250 fine.

The fine could be dismissed if the trucker cited for having missing lights or reflectors had the appropriate fixtures installed within 30 days of a citation.

Foster kids. House Bill 62 will help foster children and their families by waiving tuition costs for foster kids at Kentucky's public colleges and universities.

Tax policy. House Joint Resolution 30 will create a legislative subcommittee dedicated to studying tax policy issues and preparing a report for the General Assembly before the 2002 legislative session.

Proponents of the resolution say the subcommittee is needed to take a comprehensive look at Kentucky's tax structure and recommend revisions that can bring the code into the 21st Century and meet the long-term needs of Kentucky.

Tobacco. House Bill 279 will help prevent the sale of illegal "gray market" cigarettes, inexpensive products intended for sale abroad but smuggled back into the United States. According to the legislation, a store that sells gray market cigarettes could face fines and lose its license to sell tobacco products.

Coal. Senate Concurrent Resolution 24 recognizes the important role coal plays in Kentucky's economy by encouraging the federal government to develop a balanced energy that doesn't disfavor coal to meet the nations energy needs.

The resolution also asks the federal government to take steps toward creating incentives for researching and developing clean coal technology.

Newborn health screenings. Senate Bill 31 is aimed at promoting the well being of Kentucky's children by expanding the scope of health screenings given to newborns.

Supporters of the legislation note that detecting health problems at an early age is critical so steps can address health problems before they hinder a child's development. The provisions of SB 31 won't take effect until federal funding is available or the General Assembly approves an appropriation.

State employees. House Bill 278 improves retirement benefits for state workers by creating an eight-year window during which retiring state workers' benefits will be based on their three highest-paying years of service.

Industrial hemp. House Bill 100 sets conditions under which a state university could grow industrial hemp as a study whether or not there is potential for a hemp market in Kentucky.

Supporters of this legislation say the state needs to find out whether industrial hemp - which can be used to make clothes, rope, auto parts, food products and many other products - would be a viable crop for Kentucky farmers.

New exhibit opens at Folk Art Center

"Urban Folk Art," a new exhibition featuring the work of Gus Ballard, Robert Morgan and Mark Anthony Mulligan, will open at the Kentucky Folk Art Center on Thursday, March 29.

All three artists have lived and created their art in the city, but their work has much more in common. KFAC Curator, Adrian Swain said: "In this 'Information Age,' as our present era has come to be known, certain artists' work stands out because it chronicles their times in particularly poignant ways. Though the work of each artist is unique, Robert Morgan, Mark Anthony Mulligan and Gus Ballard all focus our attention dramatically on aspects of contemporary life that are distinctly urban."

Both Robert Morgan and Gus Ballard rely on artifacts of contemporary life as the raw material for their art. Morgan's assemblages feature a smorgasbord of recognizable objects from everyday life-toys, plastic reflectors, street lamps, etc. This has been a defining characteristic of Morgan's work for more than a decade. "We have come to expect Morgan's work to shock, surprise, and intrigue us. r," said Swain. "If you think that art should reassure and make us comfortable, Robert Morgan's work will make you think again."

Urban Folk Art will remain on display through June 17.

A special reception for the exhibition is Sunday, April 29, from 2-4 p.m. The public is invited.
