CAPTAIN WALKER.

Who Was Wounded at Santiago, Died at Sea Yesterday.

Captain George B. Walker, of the Sixth United States Infantry, who was located at Ft. Thomas before he went to the front, arrived here last evening over the Louisville and Nashville from Newport News and is quartered at the Grand Hotel.

Captain Walker, who was shot through the middle of the body with a Mauser bullet from a Spanish rifle, at the battle of San Juan, July 2, is able to sit up and get about a little on crutches.

Captain Walker said last evening that the general health of the troops at Santiago had been good, owing to their fine physical condition when they landed and the rains in the first of June. Said Dr. Purdon:

"The heat is terrific here, but in the mountains it is delightful. The weather is no hotter and not as hot as New York usually runs during the month of July, and all night it gets quite cool. During the last half the sleeping on the open ground has been hard on the men. While I was there it caused many cases of fever, and the general health has not been as perfect since as might be. We have had no cholera, but a few cholera cases, which are about three or four days in duration. Our men are being relieved and sent north as fast as possible. All sanitary measures are being taken to prevent the spread of disease. Our men are in splendid condition. All sanitary measures are being taken to prevent the spread of disease. "Often the men would wake up in the morning and find a Spaniard dead by them. While the men are in good physical condition they are dead to the world. Now, that we have settled down, we are getting to be improved on the men and officers. We have built forts on the hills and have the Spanish flag flying. Several companies of Captain Walker's regiment and the volunteers were highly spoken of. Captain Walker was shot through the breast, both ends were cleaned. He was shot while on the skirmish line. He was shot in the left breast and the ball went through and through the body
