ANNIE D. CROSS.

ON THE CARDS.

"CAN you tell fortunes?" she asked, shuffling the cards down on the table before me.

"Some people," shall I try your motives?" Her mother was dozing in the armchair by the fire.

"Oh, don't be silly! Mona's fortune to be told."

"Just manners?"

"Well, you know what I mean—not that's worth telling. She refused the last man and mamma wasn't very pleased, and now another one's very pretty, and she's all shoulders and made a dash at mamma's shawl unseemly. "Had two lessons here and one very nice afternoon tea."

"She was an investigative little flirt and wanted to know her future husband.

"Fortunes don't go into such details about secondary persons, even if they happened to be true, which the poor lady doesn't."

"Oh, yes, they do."

"Since you know what I mean—and
