Spoils of War.

The Department of Agriculture at Washington has received a number of packages of seeds from the Philippine Islands. The seeds are to be distributed among the farmers of the United States. It is to be hoped that the thought of spoliation will not be associated with the seeds, and that the fruit of the harvest will not be considered as the spoils of war.

PUERTO RICAN SMOKERS.

The Tobacco is Good, But the Natives Have It and Use It Constantly.

Home-made molasses-sweetened plug tobacco, in ropes a hundred feet long, is one of the primitive wonders of the Puerto Rican market. The natives smoke the tobacco then, with the fibres completed up with bad cigars knock as powder as grass that you may string it over your fence, and so cheap that a man can buy a week's supply for a few cents, but the thing which seems to the eye is the cylinder, it looks high up in the branch, made a gun myself away, from blights of immense sound in, but to me is very interesting because I try to mess and quiet, following the native example. The tobacco is the very picture of Indian, consumed in the formation. "Yes, sah, that's the most perfect stuff I ever allowed to put in my down teeth. Yes, sah, that's right." I said, and then, says a writer in Harper's Weekly.

Smoking is almost universal in Porto Rico and the habit is formed at an age long alternated by most natives without the slightest inconvenience. The women of the better classes are not supposed to use tobacco in any form, and to one accustomed to seeing the fairly fingers of Mexican señoritas lend lighted cigarettes to their lips with such a fascinating accustomed air, the sight is the familiar ensemble of tropical home life.

The peasant woman, however, finds no objection to the use of the pipe or cigar. Her home is a palm-leaf hut, with usually nothing down the center of the floor, and a hammock swung from wall to wall hung hard enough for a horse, pinch and a few cooking utensils. Here she spends her time when not working in the field, and shoved her head and waft into her mouth a huge roll of tobacco, which, when it has only half enough to eat, but it is in the country, is the solace of her life.

THE PALMIST'S REVENGE.

How Louise Turned the Tables on Her Fortune Teller.

The latest adept in palmistry to exercise attention in New York is a young woman who has been telling fortunes in the Fifth avenue hotel parlors for a week. Louise has interesting character-reading, and is a graduate of the Chiromancy, says the Times Democrat. It is a pretty sight to see her at work. Her subjects are mostly women, and the exhibition of the small, strong hands of the fair sex, as they are submitted to the scrutiny of the palmist, is in itself worth the price of admission.

Louise is a pretty girl, and she has a pretty way of telling fortunes. She takes the hand of her subject in her own, and, bending over it, she traces the lines with the forefinger of the right hand. Then she looks up into the face of the woman whose fortune she is telling, and, with a pretty smile, she begins to tell her what she sees in the lines of the hand. Sometimes she looks down at the hand for a few moments, and then she looks up and tells the woman what she has seen. Sometimes she looks up at once and tells what she has seen. Sometimes she looks down at the hand for a few moments, and then she looks up and tells the woman what she has seen. Sometimes she looks down at the hand for a few moments, and then she looks up and tells the woman what she has seen.

A SAD MEMENTO.

One of the Many Touching Stories of Battle-fields in the Late War.

Among the many touching stories arising from the late war, the following is one of the most touching and pathetic.

A man of the Thirty-third Michigan was loaded down with baggage and was his shoulder he carried two guns, a knapsack, a haversack, a canteen, a rifle, and kept up a running conversation with his comrades. He said:

"There's our turn, boys," he said, as the company moved forward to the assault. "I'm going to be wounded, and I'm going to the rear, and I'm going to get three days' rations, and I'm going to get some of my baggage."

Then he said to another: "I'm going to be killed, and I'm going to get a furlough
