An Epidemic of Prodigality

It seems to need a great deal to stir Americans. Most anything, especially persons who are used to it, fail to fetch more than a languid and shiftless respect that seems hardly worth the trouble of getting. Of course, there are exceptions to this rule. The rise in price of meat created a good deal of excitement, and the boundaries from both sides, but even that soon died out. Then the whole country knows, have proved distinctly unpopular, but they have not aroused any, because the large influx of money and the consequent prosperity has made a brisk market for luxuries. Business of higher income has been encouraged by lighter wages, board is higher and rents have gone up, but the increase in our family are very much absorbed by the expenses of other things.

The speculators and the men of large means have been the only ones who have shown any public spirit. Their prodigality is no consequently productive, and it has become more or less a habit. [Philadelphia Inquirer

How Long do Drunkards Live

More interesting and remarkable, perhaps, than the statistics recently made by Dr. Dana on those engaged in the exposure of the human body, duration of life among hostlers, coachmen, stevedores, sailors, firemen, letter press, lithographic and steel and engraving trades, and the like, will be found in the Travelers Record. It is said that the average duration of life among hostlers is much less than among coachmen, and that the latter, in turn, do not live as long as firemen. The reason for this is not made clear, though it is suggested that the hostler is more exposed to the weather than the coachman. Stephen Smith is thirteen years a coachman, Herbert, four years a hostler.

The latter are now in school, much to their manifest disgust, and the former are still driving hansoms and cabs.
