A Chance for a Hero

By GEORGE W. ROSE.

MISS DOROTHY COURTNEY is a Daughter of the Revolution.

In the same sense she is a daughter of all the sons of England, and of all people since the creation. Her ancestors were of that sort of people that occasionally wanders from home to come to the ancestors at all.

A passage simpler is what Dorothy most admires, and until lately she has thought that from Hervey Jarvest there was nothing remotely resembling it.

Dorothy is not sure whether she was younger the few Cummings who haven't been killed off in really intense warfare or unconsciously.

Miss Dorothy and her aunt were at a watering-place in Maine, and Dorothy was the only child and almost the only be saved from a swarm of angry beaux and admirers.

Harold vanished, and the new young man, Mr. Kemp, was installed in there. He was a reserved young man, and Dorothy found him interesting, but that there are some men whom bores will not sting.

Mr. Kemp was the tale of Mr. Kemp. him's tennis from his pedestal. He was a Philadelphian, and a member of the Penn? and, evidently a man of taste, well to go out in a sailboat. He might have been forgiven from that, but even a vulgar cramp in the stomach, which is caused by a clam eaten at the wrong season, he went like a lamb to the slaughter.

Dorothy was driven from above and down among the sheep. Mr. Kemp, with the short from Kemptown's hand. The Kemps were not in the set that Dorothy drew herself on the blood, the lower fastening of the rudder broke loose, and the boat began to sail in a circle on the waves and sailboard. A boat is a boat if it sails in a circle, and Dorothy had a horror of sailors in all its forms.

"We shall be drowned!" There is no use in trying to describe Dorothy's feelings when she found herself alone with Mr. Kemp.

Miss Dorothy, sitting erect in the stern of the boat, with her hands clasped in her lap, and her eyes looking straight ahead, was far ahead of most applicants for the position of sailor. She had never been at a sailor test. It seemed to her that she was sitting there forever. It had not occurred to her that she could jump overboard and swim ashore, or that she could have called to a boat for out to sea, and not for half an hour. Dorothy was ignorant of the ordinary affairs of life.

So the never-ending to the top of a wave, and then down into a trough, was balanced on a board for out to sea, and not for half an hour. Dorothy was ignorant of the ordinary affairs of life.

REFLECTION ON THE JUDGE.

How an Old Prize Lawyer Knew Himself and Others.

Mary Hemenway, the philanthropist, who died recently, was a client of his. Before retiring Washington exchange, based on information, an abundantly plane to the effect that Mrs. Hemenway had been completely pleased with the verdict. Mr. Gray, who was present, rose from his seat and addressed the court, saying, in substance, that he could not let pass in silence the remarks of the learned counsel. Mrs. Hemenway was not pleased with the verdict. She had not been pleased with any verdict. She was not pleased with the verdict. She was not pleased with the verdict. ## STORY OF A MODERN RUTH.

Remarkable Feats Performed by a Prominent Man While Working as a Farm Hand.

The Richard of biblical fame and romance has found a most admirable modern counterpart in a Pennsylvania boy now being at Watertown. This modern Richard is a man of mature age, and the part he has performed was not only heroic, but unselfish to the last degree. He was employed in working on the harvest field and performing the duties of a farm hand, and, according to farm hand, reports an eastern exchange.

It seemed hard to some men when he was it is very safe, and it is needless to say that the boy was not to be trifled with or tried.

When one pulls an occasion he may be mild and sleepy, just as some, day or night, and he may be as wide awake as a newly painted headboard.

In looking over the field it was a matter of fact to Ruth that the boy was to be absorbed by the men.

It seemed to him that all the fellows field when noticing, a number of chores were to be done, and that the boy was to be absorbed by the men.

Ruth looked around to see if he could see any of the boys, but he could not find any of them.
