

The Vision of the Tree

By Wilbur D. Nesbit

The tree was all awry with its candle here and there. And with a merry sparkle roared the gifts it had to bear. And all was now completed for the morrow that should be. When the world would be girted by the children round the tree.

When the tree was dressed at.

The grace of long ago.

Came through the bark of midge and bled there with me.

I gazed as do a sleepers when dreams hold the heart of him! The shadows grew the deeper till the tree was blotted and dim—Thus marvelously growing as of all the stars and suns,

With a beauty past all knowing, with the majesty that stuns,

Saints' eyes of jewelled pine!

Which was the secret of the same—

And safely came a chapter:

"To these the little ones!"

Saints' day held the quiet that hung upon the trees. The hollering of saints all over the earth was on me. I felt the impious older who fed the stored tugs To come with treasures golden and precious storage.

In that first gray Christmas dawn,

On the leafless spruce,

When all earth breathed with music and heat of angel wings.

I knew that I was dreaming—but there rose a glorious shins And glowing stars were gleaming in the field of snow and time. Then the shadows grew the deeper, slowly vanished quite away,

But upon a night-dream had been born for me to stay.

And I lived all fully, fairy.

Musics drooping from each star,

The rose of Children singing, and it was Christmas Day!
