CHAPTER XX

By the time the carriage had been driven to the door, Lucia was already feeling the weight of the situation. Her father's stern gaze was fixed upon her, and her mother's expression was one of deep concern. Lucia felt a sudden impulse to run away, but she knew that would only make matters worse. She forced herself to remain calm and to meet the eyes of her father and mother. "What is the matter, Lucia?" her father asked, his voice cold and commanding. "I am perfectly well, father," Lucia replied, her voice steady despite the turmoil within her. "Why do you look so ill?" her mother asked, her hands clasped in prayer. Lucia looked at her mother and saw the love and sympathy in her eyes. She knew that her mother would be on her side, but she also knew that her father's opposition was a formidable barrier. She felt a sudden impulse to tell them everything, but she knew that would only lead to more heartache. She forced herself to remain silent and to look down at the ground.
