MONEY FURNISHES THE PUNCH

"After all, money forms the sinews of war," declared General Pach several months ago in discussing the situation and outlook long the Flanders front when things looked darkest. His army was fighting tooth and nail and then hitting hard and staggering back, carrying a threat and darting in to deliver counter-attacks, and all the while taking heavy toll of the Germans. But he was handicapped by lack of men.

He knew, as well as other great generals that preceded him, that after all is said and done, money counts for in this cruse means the supplies that money can be made to furnish gives the army its punch. That money is absolutely imperatively necessary to win any big, long-drawn-out war. Without money—the things money will buy—any army will go to pieces sooner or later. It has been proven time and time over again.

An army may be in the best well trained, to the last detail, at the outset may be far ahead of its opponents and equal of them, but unless it is kept supplied with that is necessary for the prosecuting of war, the actual fighting men will be outclassed and outgeneraled it will weaken sooner or later. It wages and munitions, food and clothing sufficient to make it effective, any time the enemy has the men and the supplies for them calls a halt.

No army fights well on an empty stomach, of the fight is much prolonged. No army can withstand continued call after call if it lacks ammunition. No army can stand winter trench service if it is improperly clothed. It may starve, die and rot, the French did it, the Turks did it, the Russians did it, many invaders upon the soil of their country. Money is the sinews of war, the actual fighting men are the hard-handed muscles in our enthusiasm. Any factoring of effort by America now would prove fatal. Let us weave our efforts here and there as we will, we would if victory had fallen to the lot of the enemy. It is America's mission on the line war on the west front to furnish the money, the food and the ammunition necessary to win the war. Every patriotic American citizen should realize that. Every patriotic American citizen should realize that. Every patriotic American citizen should realize that
