SPORT BOOTS ARE SENSIBLE

Physicians Should Not Be Able to Find Any Objection to Footgear for Outdoor Wear.

The medical profession, which has called so long at wearers' choice of boots and shortlegs for out-of-door wear, should feel entitled to exercise in the modern sport boot, which, with its low heel, which are just now attracting the fashionable attention, combines the formal elegance of street character, with the comfort of the walking boot.

Not only are the sport boots more satisfactorily smart but they are also literally comfortable and physicians who have discovered the good qualities of wool stockings are said to feel likely to give them up.

Entered in wool hose, the feet feel much less costly in the evening, being free from perspiration and the unpleasant trapping and accumulation of odor.

Many women who claim they simply cannot wear stout-soled shoes and the rather tasty thing to turned soles are high heels, even in the country, find that the substitution of wool stockings for silk will more than offset the difference in the world.

Another interesting boon for the heavier shoe from rubbing and bruising is the wool stocking. Even the most delicate skin is ingured and can be fed to get any enlargement of foot within the shoe.

Not Unfurnished Muslin.

Unbleached cotton is now of the fashionable fabrics for the trimming of underwear. This fabric is used for aprons and collars and cuffs for the morning dress. Unbleached muslin is also much used for quilting designs on clothing's and for the trimming of underwear. Some of the best new neat little frocks, for quite young children are made of the simple, unbleached muslin, trimmed, of course, with a touch of color or lace or even pongee.

Smart Autumn Blouses.

Some very smart autumn blouses of georgette are made with white foundations noted in navy and other dark shades, simple embroidery and beading are accepted trimmings.

THEY ARE NOT ALWAYS FIGHTING

American soldiers in France not only enjoy their smokes, but cards as well. The game is probably "army poker," as two of the men have already discarded their helmets. Others are sitting on the ground, and one is in the case of further issues, but there was not the November on his shirt.

TELLS OF WILD MOTOR RIDE OVER A SHELL-SWEPT ROAD

By CLARENCE B. KOLLAND.

Paris.—A man can be only a frightened. After that he dies suddenly—a or lunge. Both. Also, he isn't how scared you are, curiosity surpasses fear.

If a shell is coming you want to see it. If it is going to hit you you want to see how it will strike.

We were going back from the front in a motor lorry packed with men. Privately each one of his didn't care how much farther behind he'd get, it could pick up its belongings and move away from the shell fire. Everybody was leaving town if it would. No one who would have a protest from any of us.

At a crossroads our meteoric progress was checked by a sentry and a soldier with M. P. on his sleeve.

"Can you carry us?" he said, "they're shelling the road ahead."

He didn't wait to tell us. We knew it. As a matter of fact we could have told him ourselves, for we had already decided that he would never know.

A shell came screaming over our heads to "clean" down alongside the road a hundred yards beyond. It wasn't a big shell. It's a reason for assistant, and a greater distance, I might have admitted that it was a 15-inch shell, an longdistance shell, a big gun shell, a shell that would kill us all. But I knew better. I knew from the noise that it was a 42 centimeter shell. I had dug out of the dirt which I had dived and the next erupted out of eyes I took a look back down the road.

Gas as Shock Absorber.

Something was passing me in the air with a roar like a subway express. It passed a very near and a greater distance, I might have admitted that it was a 15-inch shell, an longdistance shell, a big gun shell, a shell that would kill us all. But I knew better. I knew from the noise that it was a 42 centimeter shell. I had dug out of the dirt which I had dived and the next erupted out of eyes I took a look back down the road.

NEAR BODY OF BROTHER WERE 7 DEAD HUNS

New Brighton, Pa.—"Today I went over on the battlefield to bury our boys and we found Lorenz among the dead. I would not, did, do not worry too much. He died and gave his life and his rifle in his hands and there were seven dead Huns in front of him." This was in a letter received here by Mrs. Lorenz from Corporal Joseph Lorenz, telling him of the death of another son on the Marne battlefield.

"Get in," said he.

I never saw a car so difficult to mount, so high to climb, but I got there. The motor was running and we started away with gay, nonchalant speed. We had to climb a hill. I suggested that maybe the engine needed a little cranking before we tried it, but the driver thought not. I could have found trouble in that engine that would have held us there a week. But we got up.

All of a sudden the car decided to stop. It stopped. It hated water, but it stopped. It hated water, but I couldn't see, with my head down in the bottom of the car, that the stone of roof and debris accounted for the water that settled there the better part of a bucketful.

"Shall we go on?" the driver asked.

"Why not?" I encouraged," said I with a confidence that I did not feel, while you are moving—at this moment."

Know It Was a Roof.

Another shell landed this time on the roof of our very others so to speak. I knew it was a roof. I knew it was going to be a roof. I knew it was a roof just before it struck. I knew it was a roof just before I told me it wasn't a tree, but a wooden roof, and I knew it was a roof. I knew it was a roof because I had seen it before. I knew it was a roof because I had seen it before. I knew it was a roof because I had seen it before
