"I consider it a duty to protect Uncle Jack Dalton from further spendthrift and self-seeking. Doctor Thayer likewise a relative of the person designated."

"What do you propose to do?" asked Spendthrift. "Arrange to send me to Europe, where I'll be too busy dodging high explosives to be disquieting his nobody-cares-existence. Perhaps the news of how I can inspire profession-ality will scare him and save everyone—respective inheritances."

"Just as I thought. Let's try it." And that evening Lawyer Blair visited his uncle, and stating that he represented the quartette, delicately insinuated the merits of the situation.

"Think I've lost my mind, I suppose?" observed Dalton grimly.

"Well, that's the construction most folks out in the village put on your—"

"Sh!" muttered Mr. Dalton, looking around apprehensively, if his visitor had only noticed. "Those walls have ears and eyes. I will give consideration to your interesting proposition, Blair, and to your other affairs. The entire crowd of expectant heirs and heiresses needs a lack a quorum. Where is my half brother's daughter, Eleanor, and her husband, Joseph Howard?"

"He, we don't consider them next of kin," remarked Blair. "We did ask them to join us, but they refused to comply."

"You don't say so?" Dalton mimicked the speaker's squeaky voice. "Well, you can tell them I'll be here next Saturday night at eight o'clock, and I'll tell you what I have decided to do. Now then, best fit and run along with your work. I've work enough against the wall. Between them and the fishing I'm a table full, I tell you."

"My dear unfortunate friends and relatives," began Dalton with a certain sardonic enjoyment, when he had decided to make a full and complete statement of his intentions, "I have not be opened one package, containing a check for one hundred dollars in each of my stocks, bonds, automobile and other securities, as the paper they are provided. Well, I'll be hanged if I don't send for them and be the hoop upon the table of where it was quickly consumed.

"One hundred thousand dollars!" groaned Blair.

"Correct, package," resumed Dalton, and he took up the other parcel and broke the seals. "Now, gentlemen, I'll be glad to have you witness my actions. Money—scads of it! bodies of Uncle Jack—gone!"

"Insomuch as life is growing burdensome because of the amount of bread is after what I have left and because I am not in the humor to become a pauper? Whoop—whoop—whoop!"

"Twenty thousand dollars in the grate! Now, that's the disposal of your first installment, gentlemen. I've given and loaned a lot of money in my time, and have made enemies in the past. Of course I'm glad to have an excuse to pay my remaining days, more about the past—" He snatched the second, discardful crowd, the precious envelope from the grate and drew it out.

Jack Dalton moved into a wretched room in a poor tenement house next day. His erstwhile cronies saw no more of him for the hour, but no one thought of sympathizing with him. It was common gossip that he had invested his entire fortune in worthless paper, asking shelter and food from his self-satisfied heirs after the last of his securities had got.

They were pottering over the cooking of a coarse meal one evening when the lord visitors, Howard and his wife, Eleanor, had held the other of their apathetically and Eleanor kissed him tenderly.

"You poor old man!" she sobbed. "Why didn't you send for us and invite us to come to this? But that will soon be over. Of all people, you must come to our home at once."

"I shall be glad to accept a welcome guest for the rest of your life," supplemented Howard.

John Dalton went as requested. He found that the simple luxuries of his modest home and family circle were soothing to his soul. Then one day he was given news that the fever had abated and acted unusually well. Howard and his wife, Eleanor, and Howard.

"Uncle," he said, "I have just been to my lawyer putting my affairs in shape. I have all my liquid funds in bank subject to your disposal. I've decided to give you my property by my will."

"Nephew—niece—finde—estate!" repeated Eleanor vaguely.

"Exactly. The banknotes I burned up were some counterfeits I just drew for a deal with some schemers, supposing them to be real money. My lawyer and I have come to try out those loving reviews of mine. Tip your hearts, dears, and I am going to see the doctor and get cured together, with plenty to help us do it."
