COMMENT

That admirable Issac,
Purporting to be a letter
Written by Jesus Christ
Has turned up again.
The absurd thing
Carries a warning.
That whosoever has it
Is his possession.
The devil is after you.
To have it publicized
Will have so much bad luck,
It'll make Job's list
Look pleasant.

And they bring it in.
And sell the poor slave.
Who runs this show?
To do for publishing.
And he has to tell 'em.
That if he doesn't
It will get something like.
Two thousand more in bad.
And these two thousand
Will have to pick out.
Two thousand newspapers.
And ask them, please sir,
To publish it.
And if their circulation.
Averages two thousand.
There'll be four million.
With the Jews after them.
And when there are million.
Start out to hire mediums.
Of publication.
It'll be some job.

The Allen is right
When he says
The moonlight school.
Is largely moonshine.
But some cream of spreading.
A bit of education.
And more home sense.
In these United States.
Is needed.
So we're for paying.
The poor school teacher.
As much as the janitor, anyhow.

But to return to this letter.
If you have a copy.
In your home.
And you are worried about it.
Bring it in.
We won't publish it.
But we'll keep it ourselves.
And take the Jim off you.
We're already had.
So much bad luck
We're encouraged, almost.
With the study of looking.
For the latter's turning.

VOL. LIII

FOR CURLEY

By AGNES G. BROGAN.

Angela met the critics again, then sailed on for Penny eye, into the street. The opposition whose good looks were often published, had made another excitement. Of course, she must be life in the glorious sharing of riches. His grudging interviews with reporters, aroused Angela's interest; who could imagine great kindness of heart, in one of such keenness of words? Eccentric the old gentleman must be, she thought, in the impatient of praise.

That suddenly moved by a presumptuous thought, Angela's blue eyes widened.

"Why not?" she murmured into the dusk, and a moment later she was on her way to take upon herself the boy's care. Angela—at last, to be promptly called her, had been very young herself at the time. Her visiting days at the orphanage endeared Curley to her more and more. He was even a little fellow with black eyes searching for sympathy, and endless dark hair matching the mischievous dimples in his cheeks. Though grown now, the vivid were so filled with mutual regret, that Angela had gone to the superintendent at last and arranged for Curley's adoption. Mrs. Superintendent, Angela was aware, had very little sympathy for her desire, but she had never regretted the act. Curley was a most companionable child, and her evening homecomings, so loaded her—that was watched for by him and Curley grew in Angela's joy in him. Curley was a most useful and wonderfully useful. No meals could be prepared quicker than Curley could be taught to keep the house in better order. Curley was very happy these two, with wreaths in the windows at Christmas time, and pinkcicles days in summer.

Angela was in Curley's instruction, and Curley adored his Angel. For week after week, through the long winter snows, soliciting orders for a certain tea which bestowed free a certain stated amount, and in this way Curley earned a violin. Angela marveled at his aptitude with the bow, she was about to let her have her own couple lessons. But the music Curley made up for her own very sweet to hear. It became a part of their pleasant evenings.

Now, after all the promise of his future, Angela must leave the boy away—and where? Curley was still too young to accompany him; yet in three three years of home life, he had been far removed from the orphanage. So, as Angela read the newspaper advertisement, there came to her another purpose, and she jumped to her feet.

"Why not?" she whispered again.

Her cheeks were flushed as she hurried along the street and her eyes shone through their tears. She would seek the Elder's permission to take home and buy from him—a chance for Curley. Perhaps Elder would be the man of all their dreams—of how good and dear and brave was her boy. Perhaps the heart of James Elder would be moved to do for Curley what Angela never found impossible. But Angela had not counted upon the Elder's secretary.

"You must arrange for an appointment with Mr. Elder's secretary," the door man told her.

Angela turned away. Then, as another course seemed possible, she decided to see upon the following day the secretary; and see Curley with her.

A pleasant-faced young man ran down the steps of the mansion just as Angela and Curley started to ascend. She noted, from the bulging papers in his pockets, the she might be the secretary himself. Angela met the young man with the question.

"As I cannot see Mr. Elder," she said, "I want to take up a matter with his secretary."

The young man bowed, and immediately took Angela and Curley into an impressive library, with Curley standing between them. He looked at Angela and smiled.

"What can I do for you?" he asked, earnestly then she told her story.

"Curley would be worthy of any kindness Mr. Elder could give him," she finished timidly, "and I'm not married to her sake.

"I'd rather be near you, Angel," he said, "than have all the kindness of the world."

The pleasant-faced young man arose briskly. His voice sounded hoarse to Angela.

"I'm not exactly a secretary," he confessed. "In fact, I think I've proved a trusty business secretary myself. Curley might be educated along that line while he is finding out what he is going to do with his life. You could begin by making himself useful here right now. I'm going to the house keeper about his room."

"You are sure," Angela asked breathlessly, "that Mr. Elder will be agreeable?"

"I know him well," the young man replied, beaming down into her eager face. "I am John Elder, you see," he added.

And so strangely do things happen that it is now Angela who assists the philanthropist in attending to his mail. For as Mrs. Ewell, her superintendent says as large as a house, "Angela and Curley's mood grows ever lovelier for the evening. And, mind you, the "satisfy" blend can't be copied—that's why only Chesterfields can "satisfy."
