Great French Poet Continually Preyed On by a Host of Ingrates Who Drop Bags While the Vessel Is Tracking

Airplanes Used to Overtake Liners and Interesting anecdotes are told of the great French poet, Beranger, who died in 1857.

The poet was as poor as he was generous. All he had he gave away, and when time was nothing left he sent the beggars who haunted his house to call on his numerous friends.

One of the characteristics of this unfortunate benefactor of the poor was surrounded by a host of hangers-on, who lived entirely on those that were in any way connected with him. Whether he was not—humor in his modest home, the beggars were sure to find it, and the simple soul in the attempt to assuage the misfortunes of others would be overwhelmed by a half dozen of them on the same day. There they would wait in the hall for the small change and clothes, and sometimes even a meal. Beranger was the first to discourage this form of charity, which flourished in Paris for many a year before he could put a stop to it.

Here is one of his letters to beat the beggars who thronged from the provinces to the conquered capital:

"Sir—I am a native of Nancy, and have just arrived in Paris with a letter of introduction to you. I am in search of employment, and I hope you will help me to find some. Yours, etc."

"Dear Sir—Neither do I. Yours, etc."

"What for?"

The poet gently frowned at Tardif, but soon decapitated a little boy by this question: "To deliver the letter, naturally."

"Here, then, is yourself. Is not that enough?"

"What!" he ignored the correction, "what are you doing?"

"Monsieur," carried. Can't you see?"

"What for?"

Tardif
