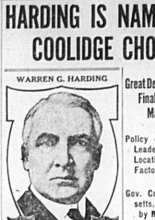
HARDING IS NAMED FOR PRESIDENT; COOLIDGE CHOSEN AS RUNNING MATE



WARREN G. HARDING

Marion, Ohio—Senator Warren G. Harding, publisher of the Marion Star, bank director and a stockholders in a number of industries, for years has been associated in the public mind with a remarkable coterie of distinguished statesmen as have been produced in any commonwealth in the United States. He was born November 2, 1865, in Corsica, Morrow county, Ohio, and is a son of Dr. G. Tryon and Phoebe Harding. In 1873, Senator Harding with his parents, moved to Caledonia, Marion county, where Dr. Harding engaged in the practice of his profession until he moved to Marion. Senator Harding completed his public school education in Caledonia and then entered Ohio Central College in Iberia, Morrow county.

This college later was converted into the Ohio Home for the Blind, and now is being used as a correctional school house. It is located in Washington Township. The senator was graduated in Iberia in 1882, receiving the degree of B. S. During his college course he became editor of the college paper, and his interest was keen in the management of this four page sheet. This interest developed encouraging his natural inclination in the direction of newspaper work. A short term of teaching school followed his college career, and he soon after entered upon the reading of law in Marion, and when he abandoned the study, Marion attorneys say, the boy had the makings of an orator and author whose ability as a close thinker and logical reasoner would have won him public fame.

But Mr. Harding always has been a pleasure to Mr. Harding, and at length he has admitted its call, but he has made no secret that he turned his whole attention to newspaper journalism because an active politician and ego long an important factor in the public affairs of Ohio.

In the summer of 1884 Mr. Harding assigned the editorship of the Marion Star, which had been established by Mr. Ireland a few months before. During the Blaine campaign year, Harding's always a staunch Republican, could not resist the temptation to boost for Blaine. The result was that he was given "fired" for "political reasons."

In November of the same year he bought the Marion Daily Star and in 1885 began the issue of a weekly edition. His energy and enterprise, combined with his personality, made him a leader, under the Star the leading organ of the Republicans in this part of the state.

It is the habit of a better men than Harding to nominate" and the Republican party has not often disappointed.

The telephone bell rang almost continually the day the G. T. Harding home in Marion was first notified that the Republican convention had nominated Harding and his daughter, Miss Abigail Harding.
