Famous Corps Ends Its Work

Northwest Mounted Police Loses Identity as Civilization Lessens Its Need.

BODY HAS STIRRING HISTORY

Ranged Far Into Arctic Wastes to Punish Crime, Maintain Order and Extend Relief—Was the Confidence of the Indian.

Ottawa.—That famous corps, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, has ceased to exist. It is now merged with the Canadian mounted police.

For half a century "the warrior and guide" of the riders of the plains had been the symbol of law and order in the territory as vast as the United States west of the Mississippi. From Hudson bay to the Rockies, from the international boundary line to the Arctic ocean, the scarlet tunic of the riders of the plains was the signal of safety and terror to the law breaking. Through mountain and mountains and forest, through the ice and fastness of the arctic zone they made "the long patrol," protecting the settler, escorting the criminal and administering justice with a relentless hand to white and red, to British and alien.

The march of civilization has brought into it a vast territory previously unknown when the North West Mounted Pol ve found the Indian the friend and wards which the inevitable Metis (the French half breed of the plains), and the outlaw, who sought this "no man's land" to escape law and retribution in respect to Indian and Metis are now peaceful farmers, the roads has been replaced by the farm, and railways now cover the country in their "no man's land" of the seventies. Only in the far north is a scrap of the original work of the police left. Here in the Great Barrens, along the desolate shores of Hudson bay and the Arctic ocean through the Yukon to "ocean will "the scarlet coat and gold" do the long patrol. The fascinating story has done its work and has lost its identity in the new national life. The outlaw has been driven to retreat; the romance and regret departed.

Origin of the Corps.

For nearly two centuries the Hudson Bay company had ruled that vast territory between the Rockies and the Rockies, when in 1870 the Dominion of Canada acquired possession. The great company had been a guardian to the restless Blackfeet, Assiniboines and Cree Indians as' kept in a fashion law and order. But nearly South Dakota had in many instances married into the tribes and their influence was powerful and firm. Then came the change in territory. It became "no man's land" with the great company without authority and the dominion government with every machinery to enforce its will.

It was a dangerous period. The United States government was working to curb the fierce Sioux. They, in turn, were making overtures to the Canadian Indians to join them. The whisky traders were scheming in this debatable land
