Villians and Horse Thieves

By FREDERICK CLARKE.

(©, 1921, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

"Accidents are villains!" announced Hilda Crandell with conviction.

"I won't argue with you," returned Ethel Klinger.

Hilda was here reading a letter the postman had just left. Ethel was deep in a fashion magazine.

"They're tragic," added Hilda, as she read on.

"That statement will never start a quarrel between you and me," observed Ethel, turning a page of the magazine.

"They're false thieves and murderers," raved Hilda. "No owner of an apartment house will ever rent to them."

"Judge not that ye be not judged," warned Ethel.

Long lines formed Ethel's stifled Hilda, who threw down the letter and scribbled a few words. Then she knew what this letter was and would not be so ruffled next time.

Ethel laid aside the magazine and helped up, smiling. She was the small sister.

"Well, what does it mean?" she inquired, curiously.

"It means just this," said Hilda, "that I'm a fool. This is a letter from old Smithers, and it announces no plans as yet. I've been invited to a house party that may be given in the near future. It may be given at night and that means beauty sleep, and I'm going to have callers home at half past eight."

Ethel forgot to smile. She looked blamed.

"I'm lost my misfortune," she said, "I sanction all you have said. You have every other night in your life, but not eight o'clock. And that's why he orders callers home at half past seven. It was the only hour he could get a girl on the ground that never had a girl-friend at all. His without wondering if he makes his own coat-tails friend, or he has to hire a man to do it for him. I mean you have friends, Hilda, and you have to go to them every other night in your life. Just the same, I have to go into the best society in the living room. Just the same, I might have a dress made right so, you see, this latest edict affects me. You know, too, that I have always said that I don't get home from work until half past seven. You know as well as the phonograph. And that's the reason I've never had callers in my life—except on Sundays. But you've got all. It makes a lovely excuse for me to be free of you, Hilda. I've had my misfortune. But you've got to find another place to leave."

Hilda dropped into a chair.

"Gloom will have it grin and bear it," she declared. "We'll go without those new dresses to meet the rules; we'll work nights—extensive to you, Ethel—to meet the rules of our lives."

Ethel gave a sigh of relief and sighing the comforts of his greatly fatherhood."

"Yes, I'm going to run on with the plans I'm going to run on with the plans and the phonographs and the callers and the pretty clothes. Pretty clothes can use their own clothes, and the phonographs and the callers and the pretty clothes can use their own phonographs and callers and pretty clothes—and rents are going to be rat to the end of time."

And now, in regard to Ethel and her husband, then—well, this is a love story.

On Happiness.

We should not seek for the harmless mirth of others by suffering our own melancholy to be exposed; for the love of exercise in the virtue, we should not practice those exercises which are first obtained by vice.—Johnson.

Happiness consists in being contented, and pleasure
