Secretary Fall Is "Surprised"

Interior Department Stages a Party Not on Official Schedule.

CHIEF IS SIXTY YEARS OLD

Personified National Parks Offer Congratulations in Verse—Affair Has Deep Significance for Army of Visitors.

Washington.—Albert B. Fall secretary of the interior, figured as guest of honor the other day in a social affair that was not on the official schedule and caught him entirely unaware. It was an unusual sort of party, and it had a deep significance for the army of national park enthusiasts and visitors that is expected this year.

Secretary Fall is a "regular fellow" in the estimation of the interior department have decided. The national park service is especially emphatic on this point for the reason that the secretary has just finished an inspection trip of five of the big national parks and the field force of the service has had a chance to try him out and size up his mettle. To cap off with a man is the question—that's one of the eternal verities that all mankind are interested in—and the secretary carries an eighty as did the late Colonel Roosevelt.

Yosemite

Miss Yosemite, taking an airs because the secretary visited her first on the trip, presented him a boutonniere and told him she knew all about him.

"Why, you're the man who made me a national park," she said, "and I'm glad to meet you."

Miss Sequoia, a sequoia of the Sequoia region in the West.

Miss Rocky Mountain, who was there with the pep which each succeeding day brought to visitors who, seeking the wilds, found as well that God is mansion.

Miss Glacier, a glacier person of a Nation Park.

Miss Mount Rainier was also strong for the secretary and took a turn at the floor.

Miss Crater Lake, fittingly in blue, but with a white collar.

Miss Grand Canyon, who was there in the form of a deep gash.

Miss Petrified Forest, who was there in the form of petrified wood.

Miss Hot Springs, who was there in the form of hot springs.

Miss Mesa Verde, who was there in the form of a mesa.

Miss Platt, who was there in the form of Platt's Hole.

Miss Wonderland of Rocks, who was there in the form of Wonderland of Rocks.

Miss Cliff Dwellers, who was there in the form of cliff dwellers.

Miss Hawaii, who was there in the form of Hawaii.

Miss Alaska, who was there in the form of Alaska.

Miss Alaska was the last to arrive, and she was late because she had to wait for the Alaska steamship to get in from Seattle.

Each trustee was presented with a souvenir of the occasion, a copy of the Yosemite Nature Notes, published by the park service.

ing with a man on foot and horseback wrestling with him. Another is a bear under the stars getting wet and cold and hungry, and another is a bear with a bear cub and filling up on trout. Each of these pictures is a story in itself that's when you get acquainted with him for keeps.

Of course nobody in the national park service was foolish enough to think for a minute that Mr. Fall was or was a tenderfoot. They all knew he was more than that, but they did know that although he was a practical lawyer he was also a student of the Spanish-American war and a veteran of the campaigns in Cuba and the east, and they knew just one of his treasures was a gold watch presented to him by the Rough Riders and inscribed to "Albert B. Fall, Rough Rider."

SELL PAPERS OF FORT SUTTER

Famous Documents of 1846-7 Were Subject of Search for Many Years.

New York.—The long-lost Fort Sutter papers, 1845-7, the greatest treasure trove of local discovery, it is asserted, that has been found in the history of the west, were sold here to-day in a collection of autographs on the west, its history and its romance which were sold, here recently.

These papers were the subject of search for more than half a century. George Bancroft, whose extensive history of the United States was based upon historical treasures of similar character, spent many years in search for the discovery of the Fort Sutter papers without success. They were lost to the history shrouded the events of 1846 and 1847 in California, and their value was sold, here recently.

TOLSTOY JEALOUS OF WIFE

Their Marriage in a Way Romantic, Though She Had Much to Forgive Him.

In his book, "Family Happiness," Leo Tolstoy tells his own romance. He was a lifelong friend of both Mrs. and Doctor Bers, parents of Sofia Andreyevna, whom he loved originally but none is indicative of her ancestry. He was better being a high-bred Russian and her father a German physician. Sofia and her sisters were all accomplished in household arts, as well as in other matters. The girls received a fitting young women of their station in life.

From the very first, too, love for his girl, many years his junior, was a thing of torment. Finally he asked her to marry him. It was his wish that the wedding take place immediately, but Sofia declared that she must have a trousseau first. Every one ultimately married in September 1862. Although Sofia was just as much the idealist as her husband, she was far more practical, and made a perfect wife from the domestic point of view.

Their life was not entirely without disillusionment. Ardently in love with his wife, Tolstoy at times exhibited insane jealousy. Unjust accusations frequently hurt her deeply, but Sofia had great wisdom and tact and bore with the moods of Mrs. S. J. Martin, county health officer.

GIVE BURIAL DOLE

Odd Custom Which Has Long Prevailed in Wales.

Attendants at Funeral Toss Silver Coins on Table for Benefit of Relatives of Deceased.

One of the oldest customs, dating back to the time of the early Christians, of giving doles or offerings at funerals, still survives in North Wales, according to a Westminster writing in the London Daily Mail.

On the day of the funeral the family assemble in the house of mourning, and a table is placed around a large room, covered with a white cloth, and spotless white linen cloth. The minister occupies the place of honor, and the seats on his left are the relatives, in order of kinship.

Outside are gathered the friends and neighbors. It is a remarkable sight to see so many men who have given up half a day's work (and the loss to be present.

At a given signal from the minister the waiting mourners file in, and as they pass through the room each one places a piece of silver on the white cloth on the table.

As each offering is made the minister bows only by the subdued sobbing of the women and the shuffling of feet. It is a solemn, impressive ceremony, recalling the time when death was no respecter of persons and when the rich, frightened, the offering was made to the poor, as they are to-day.

The money is then counted by the minister and the relatives, and the total amount is announced to the company. It is then handed to the family, for whose support, or assistance, the ceremony has been arranged.

The Welsh peasant regards it a funeral as a holiday. Whether he knows the deceased or not, he will attend the funeral in his village he will attend the funeral of a neighbor's relative. Sometimes he will walk 20 miles to be present at the funeral of a friend's relative.

Discussion of crops, work, the latest gossip, and the weather are the order of the day.
