JOSEPH A. YORE, well-known business man of Portland, Maine, who says he finds Serutan "most powerful and helpful stomach tonic" he has ever used. Serutan is now sold three-quarters blended a day!

The Voice of the Pack

By EDISON MARSHALL

SYNOPSIS

Wanted by the police that they can not find, and three days of searching in the mountains of Montana has failed to find, Kenneth Gordon, mysterious fugitive, is hiding in the cabin of Jim Lessner, a trapper, who is the brother of Ann Lessner, the girl he loves. Gordon is accused of the murder of his grandfather, Ephraim Gordon, but he knows that he is innocent, and that the murder was committed by someone else. Ann Lessner, who has been away at school, returns to the cabin, and Gordon tells her that he is innocent. Ann believes him, and tells him that she will help him to escape. Gordon refuses to let her help him, and tells her that he will give himself up. Ann tells him that she loves him, and begs him to escape. Gordon tells her that he loves her, but that he will not run away. He tells her that he will give himself up, and that he will be cleared. Gordon is arrested, and is taken to Helena. Ann Lessner comes to see him, and tells him that she has found Sally Fielding, a friend of Gordon's, who will testify that Gordon was in Helena at the time of the murder. Ann also tells Gordon that she has found the murderer of her grandfather, and that he is Gordon's own father. Gordon refuses to believe that his father is a murderer, and tells Ann that he will not escape because he had the chance. Ann tells Gordon that she will tell the police an unbelievable tale of Gordon's escape.

CHAPTER XXIII—Continued

The Prince knew Mr. Bill intended the declaration seriously, and he could not blame the biggest of the miners for feeling that the lawless element in the camp was getting out of hand. Bill had been a law-abiding citizen of Helena for years, and was entitled to his say. And the Prince knew that the only way to stop the lawlessness was to get rid of the leaders. He was all the more determined to do so because of the fact that he had fallen in love with Ann Fielding at first sight, and knew that he would have to fight for her. Business was all scattering and the usual thing would be a fight to the finish. He would get a good night's sound sleep in the first place, and then he would start the siege of Helena against Ann.

"The ordinary merchant failed to do his duty and get out and fight for the many blessings from people I know here in Helena," he said. "But I'm going to stay, and I'm going to fight. I'm going to fight it single-handed, if necessary, and I'll be glad to do it. But I have enough friends here to help me, and I'm going to ask them to help me. And I'm going to ask you, Bill, and everybody agrees with me, to help me. I'm going to fight, and I'm going to fight to the finish. I'm going to fight for the right to live in Helena, and to allow no one to interfere with me. And everything agrees with me, but one thing. I'm going to fight, and I'm never going to fight unless I have to. I'm going to fight because I have to, and for no other reason. I'm going to fight because I have to, and for no other reason. I'm going to fight because I have to, and for no other reason