A PLAN WORTH STICKING TO

In March, 1917, the President of the United States issued an order that both postmasterships out of politics. He decreed that postmasters of the higher grades, whose appointments met with the President, would be named after competitive nonpartisan civil service examinations. He directed also that the office of postmaster no longer would go to the man best qualified politically, regardless of his other merits. Under the system inaugurated, the Civil Service Commission reports to the President the names of the applicants having the highest standings in the examinations and the President ordinarily appoints the man at the head of the list.

Figures show that of the first 1,560 appointments made by President Wilson after issuing the order, 1,451 went to persons whose names appeared in first place on the civil service lists. Recently it was shown that among 2,191 postmasters who had been appointed under the Civil Service method, 1,912 were Democrats, 107 Republicans, 32 independent or politicos, ten Prohibitions, three Socialists, and 127 had no political affiliation.

There is every argument for a continuance of the civil service method of presidential postoffice appointments. Aside from the fact that it is one of the old practice of making postmasterships political rewards would be a serious loss in the campaign for efficient government, the question concerns World War veterans directly. Under civil service rules, war veterans are entitled to preference on eligibility lists. Public employment has always been recognized as a fitting reward for those who have fought to preserve a nation. The present civil service rules do not give veterans a binding priority over all other applicants. They provide only that a veteran shall have a preference over other applicants possessing equal qualifications. And they would afford ex-service men merely an opportunity to obtain appointments in open competition.

This magazine believes it reflects public opinion when it urges President Harding to continue the present policy.—American Legion Weekly.

THE JEFFERSON DAVIS MONUMENT

The Board of Trustees of the Jefferson Davis Monument Association and officers of the Daughters of the Confederacy will hold a conference in the City of Louisville, Kentucky, on April 15th, to devise ways and means for the completion of the Jefferson Davis Monument at Mr. Davis' Birthplace, Fairview, Kentucky.

The Monument is to be 351 feet in height when completed, the second highest monument in the world. It is more than half done but the work has been delayed on account of the war intervening and the general conditions throughout the South. The Daughters of the Confederacy and the Patriotic women of the South will see that this monument is completed as a fitting tribute to one of the greatest men of his age and the South will honor itself by honoring its great leader.
