Special Demonstration
APRIL 21st and 22nd

Our treat—come and get some good things to eat

A good housewife won't take anybody's word about an article as important as an oil cook stove.

She wants to see for herself how it works and what sort of results it gives.

We don't blame her.

She is right.

That is why we are demonstrating the Florence Oil Cook Stove in our window.

An expert cook is doing all sorts of cooking right before your eyes and serving everything she cooks so you can judge the results.

Every good housekeeper will be interested and should inspect it a point to see this demonstration.

All this week.

Out of Egypt's Sand

Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.

Stanley journeyed thousands of miles to lay bare the secrets of Africa to the world; but in the northeastern corner of the same continent one more thrilling exploration has been in progress during the past few decades through a relatively few feet of sand. The explorers who with pick and shovel have been bringing to light the details of Egypt's ancient civilization and the everyday life of her people, are finding that the ancient records of the nation's history was available, were as truly documentary as the civilizations as far-flung Mayro Polos or Pizarros.

For a long time Egypt was to the rest of the world a land of mystery, one of mist with a few dominant monuments—the pyramids, the Sphinx, the colossi of "Memnon"—to point to her past grandeur. Relics of ancient Egyptian estates stirred by site, their richness often amazed.

The names of many kings and some of their achievements were known, but there was general ignorance in regard to the less exalted Egyptians and the activities that made up the life of the common people. The tales of the Nile and perhaps five and six or more thousand years ago, when Egypt was at the zenith of its power, when architecture and the arts reached the days long before the Christian era had risen and fallen, and so much of the early scientific knowledge of the world had been lost, the exploration of Egyptologists was itself a revelation, constantly stirring the imagination and destroying and burying many facts which had formerly been taken as the indicatives they might have given of the world's youth.

Recent exploration in Egypt has been a vastly different matter. Modern efficiency methods have been adapted to the delving and sifting of the records of the ancients, and now every cubic foot of sand is carefully examined and combed or actually sifted that no broken fragment of pottery, papyrus, or inscribed bauble may escape notice. Perhaps the most common method of disposing of the removed sand and debris is by means of basket brigades which shovel their loads nearby. Now light tramways are used and care is taken to haul the shovelled material to a point where it is definitely known that nothing of value is to be found. Where formerly a "find" was a "find," and was considered all done for when the objects were located, now the sand is removed, so that no possible significance of position or relation to other objects will be overlooked; and before it is moved it is carefully tagged, numbered and cardindexed.

Getting Real Picture of Ancient Life.

These painstaking methods have fully justified themselves. Instead of having a confused mass of facts, many of them most interesting in themselves, but often perplexing, we are getting by degrees a complete, intelligible picture of Egyptian life over a period of thousands of years. Seemingly unimportant things help greatly to fill in the picture. One would hardly make the mistake of picturing the old Egyptians scratching matches to light the kitchen fire, but there was for long no true picture to take the place of fancy. Some of the tiny bits of hieroglyphics showed the making of fire, and it appeared to be entirely without religious significance. In recent years, however, a number of these bits of information added from the sand and debris of Egypt, and from both the ancient records of the tombs and temples and the modern records of the excavators, a real picture of the ancient
