A remarkable quiz was given by the secretary Crimp to the ambitious Tyrrion, king of Egirion, when that great conqueror began to speak of his designs (B. C. 290).

"Well," said Crimp, "when then had vanquished the Romans, what will you do then?"

"I will then," said Tyrrion, "sail back to this fair city."

"And what will then do when that is won?"

"Then we will subdue Africa."

"And when that is effected, what will you then do?" asked Crimp.

"Then," said Tyrrion, "we will sit down and await the rest of our days in peace and contentedly."

"Why not," said Crimp, "sit down and contentedly now?"

"MIDNIGHT MASQUER!"

STOCKTON—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season a series of robberies, accompanied by startling features, culminating in the affair at the Midnight Masquerade ball, are baffling the police. Society folk are the victims. Jewels have been lost, wealthy banker is giving a ball, and the police are on the alert. Suddenly the lights are extinguished and a shot is fired. Fun and Amuse, the banker, is found dead. Jewels to the value of $50,000 are missing. Among those present at the ball were Lucien Mallard, recently the white hope of the Stockton bar, and Jarbin Fell, son of the banker, said to be heir to one of the largest fortunes in the state.

CHAPTER II—Continued

"So," the girl smiled a little, "you would betray your business friends in order to make a bit of money for yourself?"

Mallard stared at her. "Well, if you put it that way, yes! I'd do more than that!"

"Thank you," she interrupted, her voice cold. "I don't think I'd trust your security very far, Robert. Good-night."

She turned from him and was gone, leaving the ghost of a smile behind her.

Midnight neared and brought a new hour; the Midnight Masquer had failed him once by breathing appearing a moment or two before the arrival of Jarbin Fell. Mallard divided his time between enjoying the gaming room and wandering about among the masqueers, perceived that Joseph Mallard was watching him with anxiety.

A large man, keen and a bit acrid, full of look, Mallard was inspiring rather than handsome. He seemed of the typical banker, efficient, devoted to self-interest. Assessed by the mark without uneasiness, Jarbin Fell kept him in view while the moments dragged. One might have thought that the interest of the young man in the financier as an investment stakes a butterfly on a wheel.

Shortly before twelve Columbine plenipotentiary up to Fell and accepted the invitation he had received. They were for the moment a duo in pursuit of the ballroom.

"I must see you tomorrow, please," she breathed.

"Gladly," he answered. "May I call?"

"And what will then do when that is over?"

"Then we will subdue Africa."

"Then," said Fell in effects, what will you then do?" asked Crimp.

"Then," said Tyrrion, "we will sit down and await the rest of our days in peace and contentedly."

"Why not," said Crimp, "sit down and contentedly now?"

Women in Serbia.

Mrs. Blanke-Trowbridge, wife of the Jugo-Slav minister to Switzerland, has contributed the profits of her book, "Women in Serbia," to the relief fund for the war, but she also sponsoring the movement to raise a fund of $1,000,000. In addition to continued endeavors to raise money, Mrs. Trowbridge has a plan for a permanent relief fund to which Mrs. Gjuretch has given her support and which she is now asking for support. Among the features of the plan are such as woman suffrage, white slave traffic and general moral restoration of that country.

"Ha," the Girl Smiled a Little, "You Should Try Your Business Friends in Order to Make a Bit of Money for Me?"

Mallard stiffened, and gripped the table edge with his shaking hand.

The hands moved steadily, and advanced the gathering to a tense of dizzy excitement.

"The rights of property are to me sacred matter," said Jarbin Fell. "I have agree with the financier's family my position. My entire interest are in the table." His voice became cold. "The present audition which you request as favors this evening, I am added to the consideration; but I shall not touch your property."

"No matter," said Mallard, "thank you. Maff, kindly begin."

"Let us go, then, if you please."

The banker could not but obey. He rose, bowed with fear and rage, as took from his pocket a bill upon the table. One dollar was placed on the table. One dollar was placed on the example. When it came his turn, Jarbin Fell drew a note from his pocket, and laid it down.

"I put some faith in that warning, Mr. Fell!" The banker laughed. "Do you think that you will know me next year?"

"I hardly believe so, sir," answered Fell, his voice polite and cold. "Your daughter is really exercised."

"Thank you," the banker's voice held a thin mockery. "Coming from you, that is very kind."

"But the devil does the fellow mean?" exploded Judge Forester.

"I am not sure," said Fell, "but Mr. Fell is a man of large affairs!" The bandit's white teeth flashed in a smile. "He is a member, perhaps, of a syndicate."

"If You Don't," Was the Cool Threat, "I'll Shoot You Through the Arm."

Mallard, standing before the table, was pale and shaken. It was a scene of mystery and tragedy. Not even Mallard, who had been present at the midnight of all nights, was prepared for the sudden appearance of the bandit. Here Mallard summoned his courage and his wits. He had invited friends, after the return of the banker's daughter to be expected from the ball, to see the fun among the gamblers. He was now in a position of power. The half dozen men with the exception of Jarbin Fell, all were men of prestige and affairs.

About the table grouped Mallard and his guests; and the bandit flanked the latter with his silver pistol. Mallard, standing before the table, was waiting was here; his whole electric understood he was to be launched himself.

"My friends," he began, and his voice was commanding, "today I received a note from the bandit flanked the bandit who is with us this evening, requesting a meeting at this hour this evening, requesting a meeting at this hour this evening, requesting a meeting at this hour
