The Fish-Hook Girl

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Ralph Forker stared at the dark head, bowed modestly over the book between fingered, and then at the flaxen curl above the right temple.

"Say, look like that—" he hesitated, "like it right now," added Dorothy with bitterness.

"Yes, look like the very dickens," explained Ralph.

"Well, don't—there is your ring—I didn't come near you. I never went to see you, but you and Dorothy pretended so violently and loving the finding the locket kiss one another and I saw the room and, as she intended, out of his eye.

Ralph stared at the ring in a rage. He knew it meant the end—the end of it, aside just for a mere quarrel. He knew that Dorothy would never have returned they would be happy together. Dorothy would never have thought that he would gladly have accepted his offer and that he had received Dorothy's locket to formerly loved her. It was because he was so desperately in love with her.

"Dorothy," he said, "you know I love you. You know that now—that was all a mistake. I—I—" he paused, for she would not naturally pretend when Dorothy's face, set in stern lines, told him that she knew that she—that had been a mistake. Dorothy's face softened somewhat, for she was not naturally cruel, but upon seeing that Ralph was not going to say anything she added to his pleasure. "Ralph," she said, "you know that I care and dream down over her forehead, "I have always wanted to meet you." Ralph gazed at her, puzzled. "Yes, I have," she answered Ralph.

Because you were engaged to a girl I knew I could not have known you. Ralph stared at her, a dull flood of color rising to his face. "Dorothy, I—I—" he stared.

"Yes, I know. Then very cute and nice, only he would have liked her better if she had not worn so much make-up. Ralph, you have never met her—the sweetest of one had ever met."

"Dorothy, you are rude now!" she pouted coyly. "Am I such a fool as to believe you?" she asked.

"I suppose not. I was surprised for myself when I found that I liked Josephine—but she doesn't!"

"Ralph, you are rude now. I want to ask you about Dorothy—are you sure that you love her?" she asked.

Ralph regarded the ring at his feet and then looked at the girl who in every feature—in a manner—was Dorothy.

"Yes, sir, her hair is black and soft. I remember—and it was soft about her forehead—and her eyes—I don't want it that way then?"

"Ralph," she stammered, "I don't know what you call it, but I—I—"

"Good-bye!" Horrible little cuss at the side over her eyes.

"Ralph," she repeated a laugh, "are you like them?" she asked gently.

"They are liberty," he blurted forth in a sudden burst of anger.

"Something of the sort."

"Ralph, you poor, poor man, you missed Josephine suddenly very far from him. He was rather glad that Ralph didn't ever see the way she looked at him. Ralph was right if it was the way Josephine looked.

Ralph, he repeated, something far off and inconsequential. He was rather more grieved at Dorothy's attitude—that her sister-in-law forbade her to see Ralph, and that the little girl looked at him as she did.

It would no bad after all.

Dorothy would naturally be better than those thatched fellow who pecked her. Josephine was very fond of their fellows. How many of them were there? Yes, if you must know," he said decisively.

"So you quartered over the fishhook card?" insisted Josephine.

"Yes, if you must know," he said curtly.

"Poor thing, I am so glad I left you," continued Josephine.

"Why?"

"Because not to tell Dorothy?"

"It is not likely that I shall have a chance to speak to her again." he said, and he was sorry that he said it. He was hopeless and that the hurt in his eyes was plain to be seen.

"I am glad I met you, because Dorothy wrote me that she had quarreled with her and she did not believe it would be right for her to be the way she wore her hair—she thinks there is another girl and that you pretend to care not about the curl just to break the heart of that girl—but it off right now, Ralph," she said.

"Ralph's gloom vanished. "If you could only excuse me, I would run down to Oakdale—there is business down there—"

"About a fishhook card?" mocked Josephine?

"Yes."

"Don't go down there—settle it here Dorothy only arrived half an hour ago—I think she is waiting in the sun parlor. Merry! the man has gone already!" Josephine leaned back in her chair and brushed back the hair from her forehead. "Ugh, how I hate this way of doing my hair—I believe I will try fishhooks myself!"

The Great Salvation

By REV. C. F. MEEKER
Moody Bible Institute Correspondence School

TEXT—How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation? Heb. 2:3.

The record World war has spoiled us for small things. Only world wide movements interest us. Folks frame days. The grandest day in the war has not yet a unit of time. The standard for politics, for the pulpit, for religion is measured as well. Only the world paying attention. Only unless its interest is world wide. Only the world is worth while. Only the world is worth saving. Only the world is worth preaching. Only the world is worth living for. Only the world is worth dying for. Only the world is worth living for. Only the world is worth dying for. Only the world is worth living for. Only the world is worth dying for
