SINNERS IN HEAVEN

BY CLIVE ARDEN

AUTHOR OF "THE DOUBLE CROSS," "ECLIPSE"

VII

The cause of the deserted appearance of the place was soon clear. Chinnabeast had left his guests around western outskirts of the little settlement, toward the bed of verdure reaching down on that side almost to the river. There, in a large clearing now for the most part flattened, with carpet of moss and green leaves, roof from roof with bush and green tracery, was assembled again the entire village.

Upon the white chief's appearance a wailing murmur arose, augmented by the screaming of frightened, cry of a child. At a signal from Chinnabeast they all fell upon their faces. Three times they raised their bodies from the ground, then down again on the earth. After the third obeisance they rose to feet, and it hoped to have the chief's conduct, with carpet of moss and green leaves, roof from roof with bush and green tracery, was assembled again
