Diamonds of Malopo

By Victor Rousseau

A good tale which grips the interest, displays deep insight into human nature and strikes a note of fine feeling.

Deals with an American, a tenderfoot in a strange land; a land somewhat like the western part of the United States was a few generations ago.

Romance and adventure in a country isolated from the direct action of the law, where the brave are daring and the daring win.

PUT the average American who has received some training in the school of hard knocks up against any sort of a difficult proposition and he will come out the loser. As a general rule, he will be able to adapt himself to land, sea or horseback.

The South African desert and the wild life of a diamond rush were new experiences to Winton Carrett, but he had the blood of American pioneers in him, and it did not take him long to learn the game and fit into the existence.

Here is a charming romance in which a young chap meets some startling adventures in a strange land and is pitted against some unusual forms of villainy. He also meets a girl—a wonderful girl, as you will learn by following the story as a serial in

CHAPTER I

The Inheritance.

To be young, free, to be wanting a new security, free-dollar cash, and in which direct Broadway is the only way. Nancy something with the knowledge that an inheritance of a million and a half dollars is to be turned over.

It's coming within half an hour now or quite an experience. It an acre particularly as the conditions are not of happiness. Winton Carrett ought to be happy.

He was happy. He had left college the day before with a degree and a good record. He had nothing to worry him. He had no debts, no aches, no pains, no ambitions. He had received not to engage in any of the professions. He was free.

He was free as good as him. Winton was beginning to wonder what it was to be free. He had been free for a year. He had not had much money to back his freedom with, but he had had a modest allowance which had been generous.

"We have to do something another with it," he was thinking. "I'm not going to be a loafer. I'm not going to be a burden to Uncle Jim. I'm not going to be a parasite."

Winton's mother was Jane Carrett, sister to Jim Carrett, the millionaire. Jane Carrett had married Arthur Winton, a poor man, and had been disowned by her family. Arthur Winton had died when Winton was a boy, and Jane Winton had been a widow ever since.

Jane Carrett had never been reconciled to her brother, but Jim Carrett had always been generous to his sister's son. He had sent Winton to the best schools, and Winton knew that he had been generous with his money.

"I'm not going to be a parasite," he repeated. "I'm going to do something. I'm going to make myself a success. I'm going to be a man."

2,500,000 Dollars Or Your SAFETY

In order to increase the factor of safety to the millions of passengers who move over its tracks during the year, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad is spending millions of dollars in equipping its tracks with an electrically-controlled, automatic block signal system.

These signals protect trains against head-on and rear-end collisions, open switches, broken rails, or cars on the siding standing too close to the main track. In addition to the safety feature, these signals expedite traffic and enable trains to be run more nearly on time.

Beginning in 1912, the L. & N. now has completed and under construction and contracted for, 1,089 miles of such signals; at a cost of $1,500,000, or $1,377 per mile. The Company spends $220,000.00 every year to keep these signals in good working order.

Constant watchfulness and care on the part of the L. & N. employes, together with the Management's policy of providing proved safety devices has resulted in the L. & N. having an enviable record for safety to passengers.
