From Pig Iron to Pompano

Fact No. 49

FROM PIG IRON to pompano, from shoes to satsumas—the Louisville & Nashville Railroad transports practically every known commodity and luxury from the places where they are plentiful to the places where they are scarce; thus adding to the comfort, as well as to the profit, of both the shipping and the receiving communities.

These figures showing the freight handled by the L. & N. in 1923, are interesting and instructive: 1,600,000 cars of freight—4,380 cars a day; 57,460,000 tons of freight—157,425 a day.

The reader may form some idea of the practical service being rendered to the American people by considering the articles and commodities of every day use from the viewpoints of where the raw materials come from and where the finished products are made ready for the consumer.

Look about your home or your office: turn the subject over in your mind when you're on the street today. How many of the necessities and luxuries of life would be yours without the modern transportation systems of America—the finest and efficient in any country on the face of the globe?

Diamonds of Malopo

by

VICTOR ROUSSEAU

COPYRIGHT BY W.G. CHAPMAN

"Come along, said Winton. "We must make the desert now. We can work round toward Malopo. If need be we'll hide in the bed of the stream for a day or two. We must hurry."

The topaz were already blowing the negro's cheeks. With a gulp Sam pulled himself together. Winton seized Sheila in her feet, and the three raced across the road, crossed the ridge, and saw the desert before them.

But the caravan had had enough of the fugitives. Winton hailed his retainer with his last handful of cartridges in defense of the diamonds. A sudden confusion of the camp followed. Sam saw the flash and heard the report, and it became clear to Winton that De Witt had at least momentarily lost his head. It was almost midday when he discovered that the caravan was going south instead of due west. Instructing Sheila to stay with Sheila, Winton began to run after the retreating camp.

But in a moment he saw Sam beside him. "Mr. Gerrett has got away," he began. "I guess it's safer for me, Winton."

That was a fact. Reluctantly—for the danger—Winton went back and allowed Sam to proceed upon his errand of mercy.

Along the fields the stones were being gathered, against the fight that the leaping Simoes could be seen the bodies of the savages, preparing to carry off their plunder. Rolls of cotton and cloth, blankets, parcels and canes of comestibles were being borne on naked black shoulders. The stones on the compound into which the fugitives had emerged was deserted, and Sheila and there were no natives in the immediate vicinity.

It was the old story, repeated a hundred times in the history of Africa and South Africa, of the untamable nature of the aborigine resenting himself against white superstition grown lax. Winton, a bit sick at heart, saw the desert suddenly peopled by a host of natives.

He saw Sam ride through the scrub among the natives on the ground upon his stomach trying face downward upon the ground, immediately inside the barbed wire which separated the compound from the veldt. Winton saw that adjoining. He recognized it as that of Joseph. It was pinned to the earth with two upright stakes. Sam followed him instantaneously.

Winton's eyes stamped with a spasm of fury. He sprang to his feet, but remembering the urgent need of action, lay down again beside Sheila, watching Sam.

He saw the negro warning his way along the ground upon his stomach. Suddenly Sam turned toward him with an imperative gesture to be still. Looking up, Winton perceived a Kaffir sentry, armed with a spear, standing on guard at the desert road behind the devastated and smoldering store that had belonged once to Kash.

The presence of this man was ominous. If the outbreak had been confined to the diamond compounds, no sentry would have been set. The fact of his presence betokened a general rising, guided by shrewd minds from outside.

It interested something more. For the man who had placed him there must have had a personal interest in Winton's capture. Yet Winton was no object of hatred on the part of the natives—rather he was one of the more popular among the claim-holders.

But Winton realized only the least part of the purpose, not its implications. He watched Sam spring to his feet and advance boldly toward the sentry, brandishing his spear. There was nothing to show that Sam was other than one of the marauders. He was just as black, and in the night he looked just as formidable as any of them. The sentry turned and looked at Sam in inquiry, then went forward to meet him.

Sam's muscular arm went back, and the spear, driven unerringly, by some atavistic impulse, went home through the Kafir' throat.

The sentry dropped without a word or sound, the spear quivering into the ground on each side of him, supporting the falling corpse grotesquely for a moment, then the body, collapsing sideways, rolled into the road and lay still. Sam came back slowly. "I've killed him," he began to whisper.

"A good thrust, Sam."

"I've killed a human being. God forgive me!" whispered Sam, shaking as if he had an attack of fever.

And there were no rocks anywhere, for the whole plain seemed to have been crushed flat by a great steam roller.

Winton made his way toward it. It began to take form; it was a dead man. He had dropped in its tracks, and the sufferings had been ended by the sun through the head. But there was no sign of the murderer, and it was impossible to distinguish any footprints on the ground.

It was no doubt the horse that had been stolen by one of the three. It was not De Witt's. Probably it was Van Vorst's horse.

Winton's spirits soared upward. He left the tenth article and went back to his animal. He must go on now, even if he had to leave the horse behind him.

He stood looking at it. It had fallen upon its stomach, and crouched there with its legs bent under it. It rolled its head and whimpered softly faintly. It was past saving, unless water could be procured immediately.

Winton drew his revolver, took care full aim behind the ear, and fired. The beast lay still. Winton knew—and quivered relief on its side, and died.

And he went on. By degrees his journey became automatic, so that he was hardly conscious of his aching legs. He saw only the distant hills and the western sun descending with lancinating slowness. His tongue, swollen and thick, seemed to distend his cheeks. Sometimes the misty desert glided for a few steps in square patches of fifty earth, indicating the edge of some fertile region beyond, but it always began again.

The sun slipped into the west, and still the man staggered onward. The significance of the patches of fertile earth was lost to him, of the regions beyond. He was only conscious of about him, with their straggling trees and bushes, and his own body trembling.

Then a cross was at his feet, and behind a fence of wire netting, he beheld a little spring, engineered at the deep-sunkers. It was a thin, unknown oasis in the vast wilderness. De Witt had evidently discovered it secret, and had planned to make this his headquarters until the rest of the army had been dropped.

Winton flung himself upon the earth beside the spring, and, burying his face in the water, drank until the shrivelled veins seemed to pulse with blood.

The sun had set, and the intense half was changing to the icy cold of the desert night when he arose, rested, and with the darkness at his rear position carrying him to action. He knew that Sheila could not be far away. He looked at his revolver. To his consternation he discovered that only two shells remained. However, there should be enough—at least enough to save Sheila from De Witt; the other—

He would not face the possibility that unfolded themselves before him. He was to feel, and was about to follow the spring through a valley into the open country beyond, when the ground attracted his attention.
