Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud—and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word. But in the night of Death Hope sees a star and listening Love can hear the rustling of a wing.

Robert Ingersoll.

"THE TAIL RUNS AWAY WITH THE KITE"

As a paragraphist in the Louisville Times observes, "the tail runs away with the kite."

The observation of the Times sums up our impression of the ticket nominated by the Republicans at Cleveland. The frigid Hyde man at the head of the ticket has his good qualities, chief of which, perhaps, is his ability to speak seldom. In the eyes of Big Business he has other attributes which make him a desirable candidate. He is "safe" in the opinion of the B. B. boys. His Panama stride will please Wall street, while his delightful cadence—"prosperity, prosperity! prosperity!"—will "sell 'em" on Main street. Coolidge has boys can "keep cool with Coolidge," without the least fear that the canny Dave Lawrence will turn aside to follow any radical fetishes of finance or tamper with the farmer.

Mr. Coolidge also has his good qualities from the viewpoint of the Bunk to whom the income tax is something he hears rich folk begrudge—but we don't think he's "strict" enough to be much with "front-page" us to death. He would make a comfortable, cool and quiet executive, at any rate.

But this "Hell and Maria" fellow, Dawes, makes a greater appeal to the popular imagination. He already has the front page. To give him due credit, we don't think he cares a jimhickey whether his name is given "position" or just "run of paper," but his colorful "remarks" have already put him "in" column, next to reading matter," and there he is likely to stay during the campaign. As he is hitched to Calvin or Calvin is hitched to him, we don't think he will have to stop into it to keep pace with his amiable and positive mate. Cal is a great salt for the publicity department. They need have called in a specialist expressly about the time Lowden declined with firmness and finality.

* * *

The burden of a majority of the speeches at Cleveland seems to have been the unpardonable sin of investigations. With their sophistry clothed in fine words, the speakers would have us believe that we are grievously calling attention to the shortcomings of certain officials—(sub) pedal on the "high" high in the councils of our grand old party.") The impression is distinctly conveyed that our deity-stamped is likely to fall into disrepute thereby.

Absurd as that argument is, one supposes that the Cleveland spellbinders should not be blamed for much. Street condemnation might prove a clue that would wound heads which the convention mental to put with approval. They were in the middle of a mighty bad fix for making speeches keep-acting, endorsing and pointing with pride, so they held up their hands in horror at the spectacle of a nation over-advertising the misdeeds of some of its officials. It was fathomer admirably done, but the dear boys must have known that an illicit bone wrong ceases to be a representative and become a "misrepresentative," and that the odium of his transgression rests, not upon the government, which is supposed, at least, to be the people, but upon himself and upon the party responsible for his tenure of office.

* * *

Except for Wisconsin, they might have gotten away with it. Wisconsin remained a rebel throughout and swung her club of condemnatory resolutions, not caring a fig whose head was cracked. Where upon the convention held its nose at the spectacle of men who would risk bringing their country into disrepute among the nations of the earth, by naming right out in meeting the Falls and Daughertys and all, and them—why then they punished Wisconsin. They bowed her and kissed her and steam-rolled her and sang this dirge to her as they marched over what remained:

"Roll, ball, the hang's ai here!
All except Wisconsin—
Go to Hell, Wisconsin!"

There seems to be little doubt but they were "all there," as the song stated.

* * *

The Mercury has no tears to shed over Robert LaFollette and his wild theories, but we admire gameness and Wisconsin had it. They romped over her, "the dog fame, boys, let me tell; she had her boots on when she fell."

WHY GEORGE "COULDN'T" LIE

Apropos of the famous cherry tree incident in the life of our own George Washington, a character in W. J. Locke's latest novel says:

"If George had said, 'I didn't cut down the cherry tree,' his father would have answered, 'Don't tell you little liar,' and would have initiated the life out of him according to the custom of the times, and George knew it. He was a man of genius. He realized, at a tender age, with that unconscious astuteness that is certain crime there's nothing like truth for the simplification of life."

Cynical as she utterance of Mr. Locke's hero may seem to one who has grown used to thinking of the youthful George as morally and even physically unable to speak an untruth, the chances are that the future President saw that circumstantial evidence had him, though quickly and acted accordingly. The same quick-working brain, doubtless, stood him in good stead at Valley Forge, rallied him across the ice-gorged Delaware and brought him ultimate victory at Yorktown.

Impressible, one might almost say superhuman bloods, in proper proportion to the task before, have long been hailed as precept and example for childish minds to imitate. The trouble with these cherry tree stories and t-shirts of their ilk, which are not even labeled "fairy tale," is that the child with a brain is either sarcastic or bored, or both. If he is the kind to take them seriously and yet feels the normal promptings of human nature to go and do otherwise, he is apt to think himself a bad egg, which is not a good state of mind for a boy to be in. He can't help but think that the immortal George could tell a lie, a whopper, if he had had a mind to, for he knows very well that G. W. had no serious impediment in his speech. Tell him that Jonah's whalogging was smart enough to realize that the truth would save him painful and humiliating consequences, so prompted by his good genius, rather than by innate angelic qualities, to do what he did, and that's why the majority of grownups stick to the truth as much as they do—if pass.

George earned no sent a pretty good lesson in the eternal fitness of truth and honesty, with Barnum and Bailey after all, even if he did have a weather eye on the Washington cherry crop, and proved his title to wise parenthood by not strangling all future prompticipies of veracity by laminite him for telling the truth.

A SUGGESTION

Mr. James Lane Allen, of the class of '72, and Kentucky University, now Transylvania, is one of the contributors to the June issue of The Transylvanian, the monthly literary magazine published by the students of Transylvania. The flight of the years has left undimmed the brilliant artistry of this master of English prose. We wonder if there exists today a writer capable of contributing anything of such quiet and graceful beauty. It seems as The Mercury that it would be a becoming compliment to Mr. Allen and of immeasurable profit to the student of English Literature in Transylvania, if his works were added to the curriculum as examples of a perfect English prose.

Mr. Allen's message to the editors of the Transylvanian follows:

Editors of the Transylvanian:

You ask me for a message, as a memory of my youth to your youth.

If I could suddenly appear among you as I was in my youth, I should be one of you and some of you would find me unfamiliar to yourselves. Youth is invariably youth through the notable human stage of little changes less. Springtime is ever the earth's springtime. What has been planted at each successive spring—that is the difference.

This is what places my youth so far away from yours. What was planted in mine—the things taught me at college and by the world—is not so unlike what is being planted in yours—the things taught you at college and by the world—that my youth and your youth can exchange no messages: they greet as strangers do.

What I harvested in college, what I sowed in college, two bundles of grain laid side by side—how could they have been grown in the same field—years? Yet they were. And youth, never changing, forever changes its harvest. The great Sower we call Nature or call God has other seed for each exchange and what each reaps makes it alien to the rest.

James Lane Allen.
Class of '72.

WE STAND AT ARMAGEDDON AND WE BATTLE FOR OUR BARBER SHOPS

The Louisville Post thinks that sooner or later we shall "be forced to demand that men be given equal rights by constitutional amendment."

Says the Post:

A WOMAN'S WORLD

We are not a misogynist. We do not think women's place is the home. But we view with alarm the persistent advance of women into the places of male activity—the bank, the barber shop and the saloon. We would not object to such if the arrangement were fifty-fifty. But the women have not only entered the sacred places of the men; they have kept their own sacred places inviolate. Such is now the further extension of the sphere of federal government we shall sooner or later be forced to demand that men be given equal rights by constitutional amendment.

In the women's clubs there are no men. In the women's beauty shops and barber shops there are no men. But the men's clubs are overrun with women and in the men's barber shops we find men, both in the chairs and behind them. The saloon must be, so far as America was concerned, the men's refuge exclusively. But the women, having abolished the saloon, have substituted their soft-drink counter, where a man should be have fallen so low as to drink the stuff, cannot but elbow room for the mass of feminity being debauched by governing fluids.

The one last refuge of the male is the Pullman smoker. Thus the commercial travelers are still safe. But many of us travel very little, and there is no place for us to go without a long journey. We look to, for the smoker. If the railroads don't soon provide a place for women to smoke they will certainly insist on their inalienable right to enter the last male nook in the national scene.

Then may we sing our "Nunc dimittis" and devise to those whom the New Testament evidently meant, when it said that "the meek shall inherit the earth."

Brass! Here's a new political bone to fight over, and one with unlimited possibilities for excitement, mayhem and mis-understanding. As radical as is the suggestion of the Post—men wanting equal rights! Why the idea—there will be some fearless souls among the married and many courageously ignorant or ignorantly courageous among the males not yet in captivity, who will welcome the opportunity to do battle for the right while inalienable and now fast disappearing rights of the genus home.

Here is a question, at last, to relieve the deadly ennui of problem-less arguments. Up with the flag of rebellion! a striped polka rampant on a field noire. We stand at Armageddon and we battle for our barber shops! With "Entre into your beauty parlors, or keep out of ours!" our cause, and with equal rights our aim, come all ye who dare and strike a blow to regain the ancient and honorable freedom of the male!

"The greens are good for sallet," says the Louisville Times. "The young onion is at hand and there are a few old ones that have survived frost red grass. The mutfins are as brown and the biscuits as hot and golden as of yore. The moon is full and the heart is warm." The Times should have said heart. There are some wandering Kentuckians, who can't come home this June, and the Times certainly forbids cruel and unusual punishment.

MONTH OF JUNE

What is so rare as the month of June?
With blooming roses, and birds in tune,
With sunlight the brightest and skies the clearest,
The gladly crown you queen of the year.

Your azure skies flecked with cloudy dyes,
Your sunsets radiant with low descending rays,
When the day fades away your memory stays,
Makes the night more entrancing in its rose-scented June.

Low hours go straying in woodland bowers,
Bright eyes fondly glancing what lips dare not say,
With heart softly sighing that "to-morrow" would be gladness as June.

REASONS FOR GOING FISHING

Some go fishing to get fish—
That is sport for market men,
Let them have it, if they wish,
Bait their hooks and cast again.
I'm a fisherman who goes
Out upon the lake or a-roam
Seeking fish, but goodness knows!
Glad to catch a sporting dream.

I can glory in the day
Whether big ones bite or not,
And my limit of get away.
Let me find a lovely spot
Where the sunbeams race and dance
And the birds of summer sing
And I'll call myself a chance
High above the world to swing.

I can lie out there and dream,
Glad if no fish bite at all,
Of the wise Creator's scheme
And the marvels He has wrought.
Fish, of course, it's sport to net,
But there is so much to see
That I never sigh nor fret
When good luck won't favor me.

Some go fishing just for fish—
I go fishing, if you please,
Glad to hear the willows swish
And the murmur of the breeze;
I go out to hear the streams
Laughing as they race along,
Bring up my soul to dreams
Touched with beauty and with song.

Shrader Insty, merchant near Taylor's Creek, killed a snake near his store Saturday morning that measured six feet five inches.

This section has been unsettling with real summer weather during the past week or ten days, the thermometer registering as high as 92 a part of the time.

The electric fan on the court house tower, which has been out of commission for several months, has been repaired and will "hum" now when hot radiness of sight.

Oliver Lambert, son of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Lambert, of this city, left last week for Los Angeles, Cal., for the summer on "The Capitol," a pleasure boat on the Mississippi river.

The regular monthly luncheon of the Carlisle Chamber of Commerce will be held at the Hotel Carlisle June 24, in the basement of the Baptist church. The ladies of the church will serve the luncheon.

While at work on the new residence of Mr. Lawson Ware on West Main street last week, J. D. Crawford sustained a severe cut on his left hand, which required several stitches to close. He was painfully dropped by A. E. Trimble.

The new tax law levying three cents a gallon on gasoline, became effective Wednesday and local gasoline raised the price to 27 cents per gallon.

Alexander Rainey, ex-farmer and civil war veteran of Mason county, was instantly killed at Maysville Saturday by a C. & O. passenger train.

Saturday will be the longest day of the year, when the sun's rays are of equal length. After this day the days will gradually grow shorter. According to the almanac summer begins Sunday.

Farmers throughout the county report a majority of the tobacco crop set out. The custom of waiting for a "season" has practically abolished, most growers preferring modern setters to the hand planting method.

Misses Beralee and Gladys Routh, daughters of Mr. J. J. Routh, of Moorefield, were members of the graduating class of the University of Kentucky this year and have returned home. The Misses Routh are graduates of the Carlisle high school.
