BOARD OF HEALTH AFTER PRESCRIPTION LIQUORS

Purging the medical profession of physicians who willfully, under the cloak of their profession, prescribe alcoholic liquors for other than medical purposes, is the aim of the Board of the American Medical Association. Announcement of the stand of the House of Delegates of the Medical Association, at its meeting in Chicago has been sent to Sam Collins, Lexington, State Prohibition Director, the resolutions also being sent Dr. A. T. McCormack, secretary of the State Board of Health.

The honor and integrity of the medical profession are being discredited by the unnecessary, unprofessional and unlawful prescribing of alcoholic liquors by some unscrupulous physician," the resolutions say in part, "and therefore in the judgment of the House of Delegates every State and county medical association should use their best endeavor to discipline physicians who either negligently or willfully prescribe alcoholic liquors other than in accordance with the law."

The Kentucky State Board of Health has through every means in its power fought the promiscuous prescribing of alcoholic liquors, says Dr. McCormack. The board also has issued warnings against bootleggers, whisky and other poisonous liquors. The campaign against illegal liquor has resulted in a large reduction of deaths from this cause and has likewise reduced the cases of blindness and other ill effects from their use, especially in communities where there are full time public health nurses who carry the warnings directly into the homes, says Dr. McCormack.

Bruce Kenney, of this county, was tried before U. S. Commissioner W. Hoffman Wood at Mt. Sterling last week on a charge of transporting liquor, and was released. Two witnesses, John Mulligan and James Tolle, of Harrison county, were heard.

Thomas J. Denton, proprietor of Fayette county farmer, and bank director, who committed suicide last week, while despondent over ill health in his will filed for probate recently bequeathed $26,000 to his "beloved fiance" Elizabeth B. Richardson. Miss Richardson is the daughter of the editor of the Thoroughbred Record. The balance of the large estate is left to his nieces and nephews children of his brother and sister.

A TOAST TO THE FLAG

(Winchester Sun)
Here's to the red of it,
There's not a thread of it,
No, not a shred of it,
In all the spread of it,
From fast to load,
But heroes bled for it,
Faced steel and lead for it,
Precious blood shed for it,
Nothing it red.

Here's to the white of it;
Thrilled by the sight of it,
Who knows the right of it,
But has felt the might of it,
Through day and night,
Womanhood's care for it,
Made manhood dare for it,
Purity's prayer for it,
Spot it so white.

Here's to the blue of it
Heavenly view of it,
Star Spangled hue of it,
Honesty's due of it,
Constant and true,
Here's to the whole of it;
Stars, Stripes and Pole of it,
Here's to the soul of it,
Red, White and Blue.

Hands At The Telephone

WHENEVER you reach for your telephone, thousands of other hands are making the same motion.

More than 500,000 times each working day in Kentucky, someone's hands reaches for the telephone to send a message.

If you could see these calls start—if you could follow them to their destinations—if you could see the action they create and the results they produce—you would have a picture of Kentucky's activities—social, commercial, industrial.

It would be a picture of a great State in swift and rhythmic action, with the telephone making possible the efficient production, transportation, distribution and sale of practically every article you use.

You would see the weaving of a vast fabric of communication affecting the comfort, the welfare, the happiness and the business or social success of multitudes of people.

Hands at the telephone! At 61,000 Bell telephones in the State every day! Think what they mean to Kentucky! And to YOU!

Chapter VI

The telegram was brought in "to Lady Mary as she was sitting down to the sitting-room, in the hours between tea and the evening meal—hours which, so far as possible, especially during the last few months, she tried to keep to herself. It had been handed in at a branch office in the north of London and contained the news for which she had been waiting.

"Elected majority two thousand heartiest thanks for perseverance.

"CHRISTOPHER."

Her first impulse was one of pride in the pleasure she started to feel, seeming to take it for her father, who was with Myrtle in the library. Then, as the meaning of the words penetrated her soul, that little orange-colored flame deep in her heart, which was so much food for her ambitions, her self-arrangements which seemed to be her sole creed, it might be, in life, flickered and died down, and color in which one sees, and the sense to take a part. In her quiet way, she was fighting for her own hand, her flags with Christopher, sooner or later, as a certainty. Without that slightest desire in any way to mislead her, Christopher had practically encouraged the idea. She knew perfectly well that, as an only daughter, was a little more assured, he had intended in her to be his wife. It was one of those pleasant yet wonderful arrangements which seemed to be wholly automatically. Christopher was well born, his friends were rich, and his disposition accorded with hers. She could never have married an Indian. Christopher had many a worthy ambition. He was now pricking his wife to further them. Her money and her social influence would be very useful.

Nevertheless, when she entered the library she knew that her father was waiting. It scarcely seemed likely that her brother could come from such a distance, but Lady Mary had not seen set at rest.

She looked at Dombey's sister's face, and her own became suddenly pale. "Christopher has had good news!" she exclaimed. "Have you brought news of him?"

"I have brought him bonor," was the unexpected reply.

"You?" Lady Mary exclaimed.

"Yes, me!" she declared. "I have been to see Myrtle about it."

"Yes, me!" she declared. "I have been to see Myrtle about it."

"I dare say he will tell you some day," Myrtle answered. "He is not ashamed. You know he has!" Lady Mary demanded.

"He is safe in the Charing Cross Hotel," Myrtle continued, "and I dare say no one will disturb him, for he has given orders that he is not to be disturbed. He has been there, he would have found some comfort there. I am sorry, but within twenty-four hours. He even sent me a telegram, a very nice little trick which had been played. 'Not'—that was the message—'to be disturbed on any account.' Well, I dare say he also was entering the gates of Marlborough house as the message was being sent. He had stooped for a moment on the pavement. Some one had dropped a purse. His own dress were closed, but I was within a few feet of him. He was talking to me with a young man."

"Why, you could have found out where they went to!" Mary exclaimed.

"I could have done so, but I did not choose to do so," Myrtle answered. "I am not ashamed of what I have done, but I am not proud of it. I am sorry for it, and I think it over, I think he will say I was right."

"You will have a fortune, but I am glad that those months are over," Lady Mary declared. "I am glad for Kronsenys' share of the money as well as for your own. I am glad you think it over, I think he will say I was right."

"You will have a fortune, but I am glad that those months are over," Lady Mary declared. "I am glad for Kronsenys' share of the money as well as for your own. I am glad you think it over, I think he will say I was right."

"It Wasn't Your Fault," She Said.

"It is too late now. Here is the telegram which Christopher has sent to announce that he received it away. It was a long message.

"Myrtle is a dear, and I love her, and you know it," she declared passionately. "I do not care whether she is an actress or not. Nothing about him makes any difference to me. I love her as well."

Myrtle was speaking the truth. To Mary it seemed amusing, and she was glad that the awkward moment of her brother's return was passed. Her self-control was perfect. Even though her father and Myrtle were living through the scene again, Lady Mary was glad that the police were arrested, I told my story. There was no reason why she should not have told her at once. The moment Christopher went to Kronsenys' house Lady Mary's deputy was taking his place. He was a man of a different type politician, a Nolsherist from conviction. He was a man of about thirty-five, 20, he said, I had much trouble with him.

"Oh no," Mary hoped, glancing at her father.

"You need not worry about your brother," Myrtle went on. "I do not know you when you go to see him. The moment I went to see him I knew that there is another feeling."
