Points On Turkey Raising

If the turkey industry is to continue in Kentucky the backward methods of care must be forsaken and partial confinement combined with due sanitary precautions adopted. The mortality of poults can be lessened by the adoption and practice of the following suggestions:

Use only strong mature breeding stock and feed them properly during the laying season.

A brood coop to confine hen and poults should be provided for each brood.

Do not let the poults get chilled. Do not ever feed the poults. feed nothing before they are 48 hours old.

Keep them free from lice and lice. ready to doctor them as suggested later as soon as signs of sickness or ear.

Do not let the turkeys eat green

Any breed of turkeys properly managed can be confined to pens their range limited and good results obtained, provided certain essential sanitary precautions are taken.

Turkey eggs may be saved as long as 4 weeks provided they are kept in a cool place and turned daily before setting. A brood coop is a necessity in raising poults. The College of Agriculture has prepared plans of the brooding coop, these may be secured from your county. Feeding and water troughs are on the plans are used these coops during the past few years with outstanding success. The every contaning a hen and 15 to 20 brood poults is in a good pasture. The hen and poults should be confined to the coop for the first week. During the second week the poults may be allowed to run outside the coop still keeping the hen confined. After this the hen may be turned out during suitable days but should always be fed in the coop and confined during the night, until the turkeys are large enough to roost in trees or upon high poles.

Some of the most common causes of low in young poults are chilling, feeding sweet than 24 hours, over feeding and using wet, sloppy or sour feed.

The following method of feeding is followed by the most successful turkey raiser in the middle west. The poults are transferred to the brood coop the day after hatching and receive no feed the second day but on the morning of the third day they are fed a mixture of stale fight bread two inches of which is soaked in milk then squeezed dry and crumbled. This bread is soaked and squeezed dry twice daily during the first week. To the bread is added a little chopped onion and sour milk. Sour milk is given at the rate of 1 ounce a day for the first ten days, after which time the poults get it every other day. Sour milk is not necessary, but does not allow them to have it. After 10 days the poults are fed three times a day feeding a little more feed each time so that by the end of the week they are getting about 1/4 pound per day. After 4 weeks commercial chick feed is added to the bread mash at night and the shaken mash is discontinued. Grit and charcoal in the poults grown but in addition to the mash, hungry. Fresh water must be kept before the poults at all times. Add a tablespoonful Epsom salts to each quart of the drinking water for the first week.

Keep the hen and poults free from lice. This may be done by dusting the hen with sodium fluoride and the poults with sulphur.

It is important to keep the coop and the ground around it clean and sanitary, thus prevent "black head" and other diseases. Move the coop frequently. From the 2nd to 10th week the poults should be given calomel tablet twice each week, one tablet for each 5 months of age per person the dose to 1-2 tablet for each 10 pounds of body weight. These tablets may be given in the drinking water or in the mash.

Feed before 14 weeks of age should be confined to pens or small yards. Confinement after this age is not necessary.

Culling may be used as a profitable practice. It is always a safe plan to keep the best birds for breeding purposes. Cull out the poor specimens.

For additional information consult your county agent.
